The Church at the Turning Points of History

BY

GODFREY KURTH

SIXTH THOUSAND AUTHORIZED TRANSLATION FROM THE FIFTH FRENCH EDITION BY RT. REV. MONSIGNOR VICTOR DAY Vicar General of Helena REVISED AND ANNOTATED EDITION

Copyright 1918.
RT. REV. VICTOR DAY

MAEGLE PRINTING CO., HELENA, MONT.
Nihil Obstat

Joseph C. Willging

Censor Ex-Officio.

Imprimatur

+Joannes Ambitus Carroll

Episcopus Helenensis.

In Nativitate Domini Helenae, Montanae, A. D. 1924.
FOREWORD.

The mission of the Church is to all nations and to all ages. "Going therefore, teach ye all nations . . . . . Teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you; and behold, I am with you all days, even to the consummation of the world". The doctrines of the Church must be always and everywhere the same, namely those her Divine Founder commanded her to preach. To teach them effectively, however, she must sympathize with the manners, customs and institutions of the various peoples she meets in her pathway across the centuries, adapting herself to their genius, to their forms of government and civilization. Like the Apostle, she must "become all things to all men, that she may save all". Hence, she has been obliged in the course of her history to break with old systems and organizations with which her life had become interwoven, in order to conform to new conditions of human society. This was not an easy thing to do. It always entailed a struggle. It often meant a crisis in her work of evangelization. If she were a mere human institution, she could not, any more than the other human institutions whose wrecks strew the highway of history, have survived the onslaughts that have been made upon her. That she has passed every crisis and triumphantly outridden every storm that has beaten upon her for nearly two thousand years is evidence of the divinity of her mission to the nations and to the ages.

Her first struggle was with the Judaizing influences which surrounded her cradle. Jewish thought and sentiment and practices threatened to restrict her work to the Jews and to those who would be willing to accept Jewish religious traditions and customs. In the Council of Jerusalem she took the bold step that enabled her to break away from her Jewish moorings and take to the high seas of the Gentile world—to encounter storms and tempests, but also enclose in her net the copious draught of fishes. From that time forward she emphasized the universal character of her mission, and, in the language of the Apostle, became a debtor to Gentile and Jew alike.

Again, when she had converted the Gentile world and ruled humanity from the very capital of civilization, there was danger that her destinies had become irrevocably linked with those of the Roman Empire. Hence, when the Barbarian invasions had sounded the knell of Roman civilization, many thought the Church would disappear in the great cataclysm. But true to her universal mission, she offered the message of salvation to the Barbarians. These accepted the cross and carried it, together with the Christian civilization of which it is the symbol, to the remotest corners of the old Roman world.

The converted Barbarians in the gratitude of their hearts lavished upon the Church the wealth they had amassed, and Barbarian kings shared with her bishops and priests their own temporal rulership over the people. The prestige and power thus given to the Church became in time a real menace to her. In exchange for it kings persuaded themselves, contrary to the canons of the Church, that they had a right to select candidates for vacant sees and abbacies. The kings of Germany even went so far as to arrogate to themselves the nomination of the Sovereign Pontiff, and for a period of about one hundred years no Pope could ascend the chair of Peter without their approbation or consent. Under such a system royal favor and willingness to do the bidding of the king, rather than priestly virtue, became the chief qualifications for ecclesiastical dignities. The result was that simony and a general laxity of morals grew apace among the clergy, and heresy began to make inroads upon the people. The Church was stripped of her independence in things spiritual and became a mere creature of the State. Feudalism had, indeed, enriched her, but it was at the price of chains and slavery.

The evil was grave beyond all precedent. It seemed irremediable, because it had taken hold of the vitals of the Church; it attacked the very source of her life. And yet, with the vitality guaranteed to her by divine promise, her great heart slowly drove out from her almost atrophied body the fatal infection and clothed it again with health and liberty. The fire of Christian and priestly life which, in the monasteries at least, had not wholly died out, was fanned into a flame; Pope Leo IX and his two successors, by taking possession of the Pontifical See only after the prescriptions of the canon law had been complied with, prepared the way for the constitution of Nicholas II on the election of Sovereign Pontiffs; and the open warfare of Gregory VII, the immortal Hildebrand, on the right of Lay Investiture triumphed in the Concordat of Worms, the State giving back to the Church complete freedom in all canonical elections, from that of the Pope down to those of the lowest ecclesiastical dignitaries.

This was the greatest triumph of the Church. Free from the embrace of Feudalism, she extinguished heresy, united all Europe in defence of the Holy Sepulcher, brought Gothic art to its highest perfection, created and developed the great universities, placed saints upon the thrones of kings, became the supreme authority of the West and the spiritual oracle of the world.

Independent in her own spiritual domain,
the Church had succeeded in uniting all the states of Europe in one grand Christian republic, of which the Pope was the acknowledged spiritual chieftain. In the quarrels of kings with one another or with their subjects, the Pope was the supreme arbitrator. His decisions were final, because they had back of them the moral sanction which the common acceptance of Christian principles made effective. This happy condition was not to last. The spirit of nationalism, jealous of whatever savored of foreign interference, fostered by a laicizing movement envious of the social prestige of the clergy and directed by a general infatuation for Roman law, gradually developed a condition favorable to royal absolutism. The death of Pope Boniface VIII and the triumph of Philip the Fair widened the breach between the Church and the State, and hastened the day when kings everywhere would proclaim political maxims to be independent of religious belief and absolve themselves from conformity to the principles of Christian morality in the conduct of their realms—hastened the day when national policy would be no longer regulated by the moral standard which Christianity had set up for the individual—the day when monarchs, disregarding the ecumenical character of the Church of Christ, would establish state religions of their own making. It was the old autocracy of the Roman Caesars, who arrogated to themselves the title of king and pontiff, brought back again to earth—an autocracy which Christianity had banished from the world. The Church could only protest and, sitting at the foot of the cross, await the return of better days.

Since kings refused the moral guidance of the Church and became a law unto themselves, it was only natural that the influence of the Church in securing obedience to the royal authority was weakened. The bad example of the kings had its effect upon their subjects. The Church had, indeed, captured the Renaissance and made it issue in that grand efflorescence of Christian art and architecture, of poetry and music, of painting and sculpture, which will never cease to command the admiration of the world. But the by-products of the Renaissance were free thought and licentiousness. These were fashioned into a system under the direction of Voltaire and Rousseau and accepted by the French cultured classes as the ideal of political society. The rapid translation of the ideal into the real, as is the custom in France, resulted in the French Revolution. The rule of force, which kings were obliged to substitute for the discredited moral sanction of the Church, had reacted against themselves.
That the French Revolution swept away the altar as well as the throne is not surprising when we consider that the intellectual and moral distemper referred to above had for a long time been working in the bosom of the nation—that for nearly five hundred years the Church had been excluded from the political councils of the country and deprived of the vitalizing power that comes from the fearless and open profession of the doctrine of the supreme headship of the Sovereign Pontiff—that the clergy belonged to a privileged order and were thus held responsible before the bar of public opinion for the mistakes of the regime of which they were supposed to form a part—that prelates and priests, notwithstanding the irreproachable private lives of the vast majority of them, lacked intellectual courage and without protest accepted the humiliation of the Church. In a word, the Church was not properly represented in France during the perilous times which begot the Revolution. If she had been there in the full vigor of her apostolate, either the monarchy would have been shorn of its autocratic power, or the forces of the Revolution would have been directed along the lines of Christian teachings—as were those of the American Revolution, thanks in no small measure to the wisdom and prudence, to the enlightened zeal and fearless public spiritedness of America’s first Bishop.
But the failure of the Church was only local and temporary. If she slept during the days of the French Revolution, it was like the sleep of Jesus in the tempest-tossed bark of Peter. To some her awakening may seem tardy, but it is an awakening as fruitful as was that of the Master. Her voice is potent today throughout the world against the winds and the waves of anarchy and despotism that threaten to engulf human society. Her great Pontiff, Leo XIII, in immortal encyclicals, which have become the textbook of statesmen the world over, has proclaimed the Christian constitution of states and the Magna Charta of the laboringman’s liberties. And Benedict XV is heard above the roar of battle urging the warring nations to respect the old principles of Christian morality as the only means of mitigating the horrors of war and of securing a just and lasting peace.

The present world-war is sure to issue in the universal acceptance of democracy. And he must be blind to the lessons of history who does not see that the Catholic Church—because of her universality, because of her wonderful organization, because of her adaptability to the genius of every people, because of her superiority to all merely temporal interests, because of her spiritual triumphs throughout the centuries, because of the divine authority with which she speaks—is the one great moral power remaining in the world which can breathe into democracy that spirit of justice and liberty which alone will insure its permanency and make its reign a blessing to humanity.

* * * * * * * * * *

Such are the considerations which Godefroid Kurth puts before us in his book, entitled "The Church at the Turning Points of History". It is enough to say in praise of this eminent professor of history in the University of Liège that his writings have been crowned by several European Academies. That the book now appears for the first time in an English dress is due to the painstaking care of Right Reverend Victor Day, Vicar General of the Diocese of Helena. The vigor of thought and language of the original French is maintained in the translation. To those who desire a comprehensive view of the great crises in the history of Christian civilization we cheerfully recommend this really great work.

* John P. Carroll,

Bishop of Helena

February 22, 1918.
GODFREY KURTH
A WORD TO THE READER

"The Catholic Encyclopedia and Its Makers" gives the following biographical sketch of the Author of "L'Église aux Tournants de l'Histoire" (The Church at the Turning Points of History):

Godfrey Kurth, C. S. G., born at Arlon, Belgium, May 11, 1847; died at Assche, Brabant, January 4, 1916. Professor at the State University of Liége, Belgium, 1872-1906; director Belgian Historical Institute, Rome, 1906-1916. Secretary Royal Historical Commission; member of: The Academy of the Catholic Religion (Rome); the Royal Society of Literature (London); the Society for Rhenish Historical Research (Cologne); The Dutch Literary Society (Leyden); the Madrid Historical Academy; the Academy of Belles Lettres (Barcelona); Royal Academy of Belgium; hon. member of the National Academy (Rheims); titular member of the Royal Academy of Conchology; president of the Board of Administration of the Royal Library; doctor honoris causa of the Catholic University (Louvain); Commander of the Order of Leopold; Knight of the Order of Pius IX. Author of: "Caton l'ancien"; "Étude critique sur Saint-Lambert et son premier biographe"; "La loi de Beaumont en Belgique"; Les Origines de la civilisation moderne" (6 eds.); "Les Origines de la ville de Liége"; "Histoire poétique des Mérovingiens"; "La frontière linguistique en Belgique et dans le nord de la France", 2 vols.; "Sté Clotilde" (10 eds.); "Les études franques"; "L'Église aux tournants de l'histoire" (5 eds.); "Clovis", 2 vols. (2 eds.); "Saint-Boniface" (4 eds.); "Chartes de l'Abbaye de Saint-Hubert en Ardenne"; "Notger de Liége et la civilisation au Xe siècle", 2 vols.; "La cité de Liége au moyen âge", 3 vols.; "Manuel de l'histoire de Belgique" (3 eds.)" "Abrégé de l'histoire de Belgique" (2 eds.); "Manuel d'histoire universelle", 2 vols.; "Notre nom national"; "Mizraim, Souvenirs d'Egypte"; "La nationalité Belge"; founder and first director of "Archives Belges, revue critique d'archiographie nationale". The Catholic Encyclopedia contains the following articles from his pen: Belgium; Burgundy; Charles Martel; Clotilda, Saint; Clovis; Egmont, Count of Lamoral; Frankenburg, Johann Heinrich, Graf von; Francis; Fredegarius; Granvelle, Antoine Perrenot de; Netherlands; Philip II (Spain).

The reader owes the above sketch to the courtesy of the Encyclopedia Press.

Should "The Church at the Turning Points of History" prove acceptable to the reading public, it might be followed by a translation of Godfrey Kurth's unique and remarkable work: "Les Origines de la Civilisation Moderne".

Brief historical notes are occasionally given to enable the person who has not recently studied general history to read the lectures of the master-historian, Godfrey Kurth, with more pleasure and profit.

Gratitude compels me to acknowledge my indebtedness to the Reverend Stephen J. Sullivan, D. D. for his valuable assistance in the translation of the present work.

Victor Day
PREFACE OF THE AUTHOR

This booklet contains the substance of a course of lectures given at the "Women's University Extension" in Antwerp, during the scholastic year 1897-1898.

This explains sufficiently the plan and style of the work. There was question of presenting to an intelligent audience the great lines of a tableau which must be surveyed at one glance, if one wishes to grasp its vast and striking unity.

Friendly critics have asked me to give references for the statements made. I have not deemed it wise to burden with annotations lectures which aim to present ideas rather than to state facts. As will be seen, I take it for granted that the latter are known to the reader, and I trust that he will take my word for occasional statements of facts with which he may not be familiar.

GODFREY KURTH
General Analytical Index

The Mission of the Church

Christianity opens new era for humanity .................................................. 17
Christianity offers supreme happiness to all ............................................. 18
Paganism brings empty pleasure to few .................................................... 20
The Church is reservoir of divine life of Christianity .............................. 23
How the Church fulfils her mission ........................................................... 25

The Church and the Jews

Christianity hindered in expansion by question of Ancient Law ............... 27
Christian Church Jewish in origin ............................................................ 28
Gentile converts required to become naturalized Jews ............................. 30
Christian Church without light on subject .............................................. 33
Vision of Peter solves problem—Baptism of Cornelius ............................ 35
Ultra-Jewish Christians still object ......................................................... 38
Council of Jerusalem imposes solution ..................................................... 40
First turning point in Church's history .................................................... 43

The Church and the Barbarians

Christianity becomes religion of Roman Empire .................................... 44
Christianity linked with Roman civilization ........................................... 45
Barbarians capture Rome ................................................................. 46
The Christian Romans see in fall of Rome end of civilization ................. 50
Catholic Church sees in Barbarian movement birth of new civilization ... 53
The second turning point in Church's history ......................................... 56

The Church and Feudalism

Generosity of Barbarians to Church ....................................................... 59
Secular interference with Church affairs ................................................. 61
Lay investiture ......................................................................................... 63
Evil results of lay investiture .................................................................. 64
Albigensian heresy ................................................................................. 67
Restoration of Christian spirit among clergy ......................................... 72
Reforms demanded .................................................................................. 75
Difficulty of situation .............................................................................. 76
Tact of Leo IX. and successors ............................................................... 77
Nicholas II. regulates election of sovereign pontiffs ................................ 79
Gregory VII. proscribes lay investiture ................................................... 80
Gregory VII. triumphs ............................................................................ 84
A turning point in history of Church .................................................... 86
The Church and Neo-Caesarism

The Church at its zenith...........................................87
Rule of Christian society wrested from Pope by Lay State...90
Limited authority of kings becomes absolute..................91
Royal absolutism due to ultra-nationalism and adoption of Roman law .................................................................92
Roman law fosters unbridled absolutism or Caesarism......98
Kings of Germany strive to apply Caesarism .................101
Philip the Fair struggles for absolutism against Boniface VIII. ..................................................................103
Declarations of Philip imply separation of politics and Christian morality .......................................................107
Forbearance of Boniface VIII. ......................................108
Characteristics of first encounter between Pope and King...111
Philip the Fair attacks immunities of Church.................112
Philip attacks Pope’s ambassador ..................................114
Philip causes arrest of Pope .........................................116
Philip attacks memory of Boniface ...............................118
Modern French historians exonerate Boniface ...............119
Evil results of neo-Caesarism ......................................120

The Church and the Renaissance

The Renaissance is a natural development of society of Middle Ages ...............................................................123
The Renaissance leads some to imitate morals of pagan antiquity .................................................................128
The Renaissance leads all to exaggerate literary merits of pagan antiquity ..........................................................133 Infatuation with pagan antiquity begets in some contempt for Christianity ..............................................137
Some admirers of the Renaissance attempt to paganize modern world .........................................................140
Some condemned whole movement because of its abuses....147
The Catholic Church, on the contrary, headed the movement in the right direction .................................................150 Importance of stand taken by Church at this turning point of history .............................................................155

The Church and the Revolution

Revolution unforeseen ..................................................160
Purpose of Revolution destruction of ancient regime.....162
Free thought one of the causes of Revolution..............164
Licensiousness another cause of Revolution.................167
Unbelief and licentiousness fostered by Voltaire.........168
Seductive theories of Rousseau impelling factor ...........171
Philosophers put theories into practice—Revolution accomplished ............................................................175
Poor showing of lawmakers ........................................177
Revolutionary leaders overthrown ..............................178
Revolution could have been avoided ..........................182
New awakening of Christian society ..........................188
The Mission of the Church

In the history of mankind considered as a whole, there are two grand divisions. On the one hand, there is the ancient world seated in the darkness of death; on the other hand, the modern world which advances in the light of the Gospel. This is, beyond compare, the greatest fact of history.

Christianity opens new era for humanity.

The opposition between these two worlds is sharp and well-defined. The line of demarcation which separates them is very clearly drawn. It is not an imperceptible and gradual evolution that leads humanity from the one to the other. It is rather a new spiritual influence, a mighty impulse which brings about an immediate and radical change. We know the precise date of this great change, and we have taken that date as the starting point of our chronology. It is the Christian era that opens the annals of a new creation and a new humanity.

What is the vital principle of this new creation? It is the new ideal brought into the world by Jesus Christ, or, to adhere to the simplicity of the Gospel language, it is what Jesus Christ Himself calls the New Law. Deposited within the bosom of humanity as leaven in the paste—this comparison is also His—it produces there the marvelous fermentation that transforms the most refractory elements. Allow this leaven to do its work. The more it acts, the more substantial and nourishing will be the bread of civilization.

Christianity offers supreme happiness to all.

The principle of Christian civilization is essentially opposed to that of ancient society. Compare the two worlds: on the surface you perceive many characteristics common to both, but at the bottom of these common traits you perceive the irreducible contradiction of the fundamental idea on which they are based. There is question not merely of a difference of degree, but of a difference of nature which has a bearing on a most important matter, on the most vital interests of humanity. The two societies differ in their respective conception of life and the solution they give to the problem of existence.

Antiquity has never proposed this problem in formal terms; moreover the ancients lacked both the courage and the knowledge required to solve it. In practice, however, they have always given the wrong solution. Christianity has proposed the question boldly and has answered it in a triumphant manner.
Why was man placed in this world, and what is the end of his existence here below? Must he be only the ephemeral spectator of the tableau of creation, or the unconscious instrument of some mission higher than his own, or the lamentable plaything of blind forces that dispute the possession of his senses and of his heart? Is he, with the contradictions that are at the root of his being, and with his boundless aptitude for suffering, the abortive child of this world and the plaything of an eternal illusion? Has he a future to conquer, an end to attain, and are this future and this end worth the effort they cost him? Or is he only a fortuitous and lamentable combination of elements associated for the time in a community of joys and of sufferings, to be finally disassociated and recomposed later on in the eternal circle of pitiless fatalities?

Christianity answers these questions with absolute clearness and certitude.

Man is not a child of chance—he is the creature of God. God has made him the king of creation. He has given him a mind to know Him, a heart to love Him, and a will to be in accord with His own. He has opened before him the way he must follow, He has taught him the law he must observe, He has promised him eternal happiness as the reward for fidelity in serving Him. In other words, He has made the fidelity of man to the Supreme Being the condition of his supreme happiness.

Paganism brings empty pleasure to few.

This is the teaching of Christianity. In this promise all religions and philosophies join Christianity. But, unable to rise with her to the pure and high sources whence flows the true happiness of the human race, they flutter about with their short wings in a common and feverish aspiration for happiness. They also promise happiness to men, but they do not understand it as Christianity does. The good in which they make men hope to find this happiness, has none of the qualities that give it stability. It is not absolute, it is not pure, it is not eternal. It is a sum of joys that do not go beyond the duration of time, the boundaries of earth, or the reach of mankind. In a word, it is not happiness, but pleasure; sometimes pleasure of a higher order, when, as with elevated souls, it consists in the intoxication of glory; other times pleasure of a low and degrading kind, when, as with the multitude, it limits itself to the gross pleasures of the senses. In every case, whether it be intellectual or material, it is but the shadow, or to speak better, it is only the appearance of happiness. And yet this sort of pleasure—and this alone—antiquity had the courage to promise to men, and the power to procure for some of them. And antiquity never meant anything else when there was mention of Roman felicity, that fiction so dear to the statesmen of the Empire of the Caesars.

Quite a complicated machinery was needed to realize this paltry happiness. It was necessary to place in common the powers of all men, and to deposit them in the hands of a being produced by their collectivity, the State. Invested with all the power and the rights which before could have resided in all and in each of its members, the State undertook to procure for them the sum of all the enjoyments which constituted their ideal of happiness. These enjoyments may be summed up in two words: idleness and voluptuousness. To eat one's bread without labor and to pass one's time in amusement was, to use a familiar and at the same time a very exact phrase, the maximum of felicity as the ancient State understood it.

It was not much, and, nevertheless, how few could enjoy this meager happiness. It could be the lot of but a small minority. If a man lives without work, he forces others to work for him; if he lives for pleasure, it is necessary for him to have an army of people who will furnish him amusement. There existed, therefore, legions of slaves of every kind to procure bread and pleasure for the favorites of the State; the terrestrial paradise of the chosen few had for its correlative the terrestrial hell of the multitude. Even at this price, were the elect sure of their happiness? No: they wasted away with disgust and weariness. For, such is the inexorable providential law attached to the abuse of earthly pleasures. Pleasure, chosen as an end, is a cruel god who devours his adorers. In the midst of pleasure, the happy ones of the world felt themselves taken at the throat by the lurking hand of death which crouched within their poisoned joys. They saw these sources of prosperity that formerly were fed by the sacred sweat of labor dry up around them. The Empire was no longer defended except by Barbarians; public works were carried on only by slaves; the fields, deserted by the farmer, were fruitless; the ranks of human society began to thin out in a dreadful manner. Happiness, as understood by the ancient world, was nothing but the slow suicide of society. Thus, universal misery sprang from the very principle of the civilization that had promised to its votaries happiness here below.

The happiness Christianity promises to man, presents a sum of characteristics radically opposed to those of the Roman felicity. It consists in the enjoyment of a Supreme Being, that is to say, in the union with God. It is perfect like the Good which is its principle, it is indefectible, it is eternal, it is made for all on the sole condition that they obey the law of love: to love God above all things and one's neighbor as oneself. The happiness of the pagan is not possible without the corresponding misery of the majority of the human race. The Christian cannot be truly happy unless he make as many as possible of his fellow men participate in his happiness. He does this directly by the daily practice of charity, and indirectly by mortification and labor. By mortifying himself he frees those who minister to his pleasures; by working he produces a wealth that increases the well-being of others. In principle, a Christian society is a society of brothers, just as in principle, a pagan society is a society of slaves.

The Church is reservoir of divine life of Christianity.

It is not enough to know the difference, or better, the opposition, between these two principles. It is necessary also to see how the Christian principle was able to implant itself in human society notwithstanding the violence which it does to human nature, how it could continue in existence notwithstanding the bitter war which all the passions have declared against it, how it has succeeded in becoming the guide and the light of the better part of the human race. Why does the word which has promulgated the New Law always dominate the development of our civilization, as an ideal acclaimed even by those who misunderstand it; while so many other golden words, fallen from the lips of the ancient sages, have suffered the lot of those delicious perfumes which are exhaled by some choice flower but which, after having for a time perfumed the neighborhood, scatter and vanish in the air without leaving a trace save in the memory?

Christian faith answers that this word is a divine word, and that the words of Jesus Christ, according to His promise, will not pass away. But the Christian, who seeks to give an account of his faith, is not forbidden to study the manner in which Providence assures to His word the indefectible authority it should have over men. If Christianity has been more than a sublime philosophical doctrine, if it has been a principle of life and of action which has permeated, quickened, and transformed the world, it is because, from the first, it was so constituted that it could live and perpetuate itself on earth. It was clothed with a living body which became the agent of its transcendent action; this body is the Church.

The Church, with her powerful and incorruptible organism, is the reservoir of the divine life of Christianity, distributing this life and renewing it at its source. She has been created perfect, because to fulfill her mission she must have in herself the principle of life; sovereign, that she may be fettered by no one; universal, to embrace all men; indefectible, to extend to all generations. It is in her and by her that the human race realizes its supernatural mission, which is the conquest and the enjoyment of the Supreme Good. She assumes the direction of the moral life, but leaves to the State a portion beautiful enough. This portion is the earth, which the State has at all times claimed and striven to obtain. The Church reserves for herself heaven, in which the State has no concern.

The State is the society of bodies, the Church, of souls. The former is the kingdom of men, the latter is the Kingdom of God. The Church does not declare war on the State, she extends to it the hand of friendship. If the State helps the Church, she blesses it; if the State respects her liberties, she asks nothing more; if the State attacks these liberties, she sheds her blood rather than allow it. For she cannot renounce her mission. She has received charge to teach all nations. She is responsible to God for the salvation of humanity and, with regard to this duty, every man has the right to call her to account.

How the Church fulfils her mission.

How has the Church fulfilled her mission? During the course of the nineteen centuries just elapsed, has she always grasped the many and changeable problems that have confronted her? Has she, like the father of the family spoken of in the Gospel, known how to draw from her treasure the eternal truths which admit of no compromise, together with the new applications which vary according to the diversity of time and place? Has she known how to speak their language to all the centuries she has traversed, and to familiarize herself with the genius of all the peoples she has met on her way? Has she been, has she truly remained, that universal and indefectible society that contains within itself all civilization, or would she be merely one of those fleeting forms, in which, at a given moment, the human race embodied its ever changing aspirations? This is the question which it behooves us to answer in the lectures that will follow.

In these talks a grand panorama will be unrolled. I dare say, there is none grander in all history, nor is there any more instructive. It is not for me to deduce in advance its teachings; but from the very outset who could doubt of their bearing and eloquence? They will, I hope, speak loud enough to be understood without much mental effort. Our ambition will be more modest and at the same time more elevating than the wild fancy of the ancient Greek philosopher Pythagoras, who believed he heard the harmony produced by the eternal movement of the spheres. We will strive to understand the voice that issues forth from the great phenomena of history, and which is, in a certain measure, the voice of God.
The Church and the Jews

In this lecture, I shall try to answer this question: How did Christianity become a universal religion? At first sight it would seem that this is not a question at all. At this day it is indeed beyond question that Christianity is, by its nature, the religion of humanity and that, once she had received her mission to preach the Gospel to every creature, she could not shirk it without perishing. But these considerations, which are enough for the faith of the believer, do not satisfy the curiosity of the historian. For, what interests the historian is not merely the terminal of the journey but the course of travel as well. The question under consideration comes then to this: What obstacles hindered Christianity from becoming a universal religion? and how did she succeed in overcoming them?

Christianity hindered in expansion by question of Ancient Law.

The great obstacles, or, rather, the chief danger that the Church encountered in the first years lay in her ignorance of the attitude to be assumed concerning the Ancient Law and Israel. The lapse of time has solved this problem clearly and with precision, and now it is within the grasp of a child. There is nothing now in common between Israel rejected, shut up within her synagogue, and the people of God gathered about the Church. But it was quite different when the Church came into being. Far from considering Israel as the people of reprobation, the Christians, one and all, the Apostles at their head, continued to regard the Jews as the people of God. Being Jews themselves and holding fast to the Law of Moses, they saw in Christianity the complement of the Law and in the Church the consummate flower that came forth to crown the fertile root of Jesse.

Christian Church Jewish in origin.

And how could they have believed otherwise? For centuries Israel had waited for the Messias, who was to come according to the promise of the prophets to establish the kingdom of God, and to bring upon earth the reign of justice and peace. It mattered not whether this kingdom was of a temporal order—as the greater part of the Jews believed—or of the spiritual order—as the Christians admitted from the beginning—this much was certain to them all:—it was to be the kingdom of Israel. Was it not the people of Israel who had received the divine promises? Was it not Abraham to whom it had been foretold that his posterity would be as numerous as the stars of heaven, and was it not David to whom God had announced that he had made a covenant with his house and that from him should come forth the Desired of all Nations? Was not Israel the guardian of the Law, of that Law which Christ said He had come to fulfill and not to destroy? And had He not said further that He had come first for the wandering sheep of the flock of Israel, and had He not recommended His Apostles to preach the Gospel first to the Jews?

How, then, could the Church have been to men of that time other than an extension of Israel, a new budding forth of Jacob? She was wholly Jewish: her Divine Founder was a Jew, the apostles and disciples were Jews, the first converts also were Jews. The three thousand persons whom Saint Peter baptized at Jerusalem, on the day of Pentecost, were Jews of the dispersion; and he addressed Jews exclusively, when he said: "Therefore let all the house of Israel know most certainly that God hath made both Lord and Christ, this same Jesus, whom you have crucified."(*)

And later, when the apostles and disciples carried the Gospel beyond Judea, they tarried only in the towns where there were Jews, stayed in the Jewish quarters, frequented the synagogues, and it was there they announced to all that the Messias of the prophets had come and that He was called Jesus of Nazareth. In a word, everywhere, throughout the entire world as at Jerusalem, the Church was sinking its roots deep into the synagogue, and the first Christian congregations were in truth assemblies of Jews.

Gentile converts required to become naturalized Jews.

This does not mean that this Christian Church of Jewish nationality wished to close her doors to the gentiles. On the contrary, she dreamed of gathering within her embrace all the people of the earth, in order to comply with the demand of Christ. The Jewish people themselves never exercised towards the rest of humankind that absolute isolation which ill-informed historians impute to them. At all times they strove to win to their faith the children of other nations, and their proselytism was as active as it was sincere. The Gospel itself gives testimony of this in these words: “Woe to you scribes and pharisees: because you go round about the sea and the land to make one proselyte: and when he is made, you make him the child of hell twofold more than yourselves.”

Thus the people of Israel were surrounded by a throng of proselytes. One class of proselytes were called Proselytes of the Gate, because they were permitted to pass only the first gate of the court of the Temple: they were such as acknowledged the true God, abstained from all idolatry and observed the seven precepts of the natural law. The second class were called Proselytes of Righteousness, and were those who accepted the whole Jewish religion and who pledged themselves to observe all the precepts without exception. Initiated through the rite of circumcision, they had the same rights and the same duties as the Israelites by birth.

In general, in order to become servers of the true God, the proselytes were obliged, if I may use a modern expression, to become naturalized Jews:—this was the absolute condition. The Proselytes of Righteousness possessed, in virtue of the rite of circumcision, their final naturalization papers; henceforth they became part not only of the synagogue, but of the Jewish nation. The Proselytes of the Gate, initiated in a manner less complete, saw themselves excluded, by that very fact, from participation in the Jewish worship; the Temple remained closed to them; they were but the protégés and clients of Israel, or, if you like, they were Jews of second rank. In a word, without denying to anyone the right to adore with her the true God, Israel expected each worshiper to receive from her, in some way, the investiture, to become a Jew in more or less measure, according to the right he wished to enjoy. The Jews regarded themselves as forming within the family of the servers of God the central nucleus, the circle of the elite; they meant to be to the rest of humanity what Levi had been within his fold, the race marked forever with a sign of predilection, the priestly tribe which stood as the intermediary between God and man.

Such was the Jewish view-point, which the first Christians, Jews themselves, carried with them into Christianity. They saw in the Church a synagogue of superior order to which God had revealed the obscure meaning of the prophecies, but a synagogue nevertheless into which no one could enter without being a member either by birth or by adoption of the people of Israel. Now then, I ask, was this really the way to bring nations to embrace the Gospel, to oblige them to give up their nationality as well as their religion? When one sees even to-day the injury that national susceptibilities, often the best founded, cause to the Catholic apostolate and to the advance of the Gospel, it can be surmised what would have been the result if, at that time, there had been imposed upon nations the most unbearable of all humiliations—national renunciation. Allow me to illustrate by an example. If to-day the German Lutherans, the English Episcopalians, the Russian Schismatics and other peoples whom we desire to unite within the unity of faith, were told that, in order to become Catholic, they must first become Frenchmen, do you think it would hasten their conversion and that there would be any hope of seeing them make profession of our faith? And yet France is a great and glorious nation, enjoying the respect of all, even of those who hate her; while the Jews were a little nation universally despised, an object of hatred to the whole human race, as Tacitus states, about whom were spread most repugnant tales. For a Greek or a Roman to renounce his national title and become a Jew would have meant not only to give up his national traditions but also to embrace cheerfully opprobrium and ridicule, by assuming a nationality that was in a way under the ban of civilization.

Christian Church without light on subject.

Here we see how Israel, by her pretensions to leadership in the kingdom of God, hindered the propagation of the Gospel. So long as Israel stood between the Savior and the human race, the human race was bound to keep away from the Savior. This is plain to us of modern times who look at this epoch at the distance necessary for clear vision and who have sufficient freedom of mind to form a fair judgment. But such was not the position of those who, whether Christian or Jew, lived in the midst of occurring events without being able to foresee their course. How could they foresee it without being prophets? And how would they have dared to choose a line of conduct without a special revelation? The apostles themselves were without light upon this weighty problem. The Gospels did not furnish them with the solution. They were children of Israel and they had to be on their guard lest they should lay themselves open to calumny; under the conditions, could they have been other, should they have been other, than good patriots and faithful observers of the Law of Moses? And this they were, all of them. The most finished type of the true Jew, whom all the Jews venerated and delighted to call the Just, was himself an apostle, nay more, he was a relative of Jesus—known as St. James the Less. Certainly these are not the sort of men who could guess the danger that threatened the Church in its deadly grapple with Judaism, much less break the bond that seemed to tie the Church forever to the synagogue.

Thus, humanly speaking, Christianity found itself in its early days in a blind alley. It remained a national religion, it was not becoming a universal religion. It was merely a phenomenon of the inner history of Judaism, a religious revolution that could arouse only the Jews, and attract to itself only the scornful curiosity of the rest of the world. The pagan world would hear only the little that was said of it by the Roman historians, Suetonius and Tacitus, namely, that a little nation which on account of its fanaticism was consigned to the execration of humanity had one day been set in turmoil by innovations preached within its fold by a certain Chrestus and that, in order to end these troubles, the Jews had been expelled from Rome.

Vision of Peter solves problem—Baptism of Cornelius.

It was at this moment that there occurred the extraordinary scene of which the Acts of the Apostles have preserved a detailed account. I ask permission to reproduce this sacred page; none more fateful is found in the history of Christianity.

There was in the city of Caesarea, in Palestine, a centurion of the Roman army, named Cornelius. He was a just man and God-fearing. One day an angel appeared to him saying that his prayers had been agreeable to the Lord, and that he was to send for one Simon Peter who was then living at Joppe, in the house of a tanner by the seaside. Cornelius obeyed and despatched three men to the Apostle. I leave the words to the inspired text:

"And on the next day whilst they were going on their journey, and drawing nigh to the city, Peter went up to the higher parts of the house to pray about the sixth hour. And being hungry, he was desirous to taste something. And as they were preparing, there came upon him an ecstasy of mind;"
And he saw the heavens opened, and a certain vessel descending, as it were a great linen sheet let down by the four corners from heaven to the earth.

Wherein were all manner of fourfooted beasts, and creeping things of the earth, and fowls of the air.

And there came a voice to him: Arise, Peter, kill, and eat.

But Peter said: Far be it from me; for I never did eat anything that is common and unclean.

And the voice spoke to him again the second time: That which God hath cleansed do not thou call common.

And this was done thrice: and presently the vessel was taken up into heaven.

Now whilst Peter was doubting within himself what the vision that he had seen should mean: behold the men who were sent from Cornelius, inquiring for Simon’s house, stood at the gate.

And when they had called, they asked, if Simon, who is surnamed Peter, were lodged there?

And as Peter was thinking of the vision, the Spirit said to him: Behold three men seek thee.

Arise, therefore, get thee down, and go with them, doubting nothing: for I have sent them.” (*)

Peter, obedient to the Holy Ghost, accompanied the messengers to Caesarea where he baptized Cornelius and his whole family. For the first time there was in the Church a Gentile who had not passed through the synagogue.

The vision of St. Peter is the divine solution of the irritating problem. Under a most expressive symbolic formula the vision announces that the ancient Law is no longer binding on the Christians, and that consequently one can be a Christian without being a Jew. The Church will not be a Jewish community; it will be an international society where shall meet as brothers, without distinction of rite or race, the Jew and the Gentile, the master and the slave, the poor and the rich. In vain then does Israel promise herself the first place in the kingdom of God. Israel can disappear without causing a vacancy; her mission is ended and her place henceforth will be taken by a spiritual Israel made up of all the faithful.

One will understand the excitement that was stirred up in Jerusalem at news of the baptism in Caesarea. St. Peter was interpellated and had to explain; he made known that he had acted only on the order of the Lord, and his contradictors kept silent. As to the faithful, they repeated among themselves:
“God then hath also to the gentiles given repentance unto life.”

Ultra-Jewish Christians still object.

Accordingly it might seem that all difficulties had been removed and that all discussion, all hesitation had ceased in the Church now that its course had been set right by the hand of God Himself. But this would be to disregard the intensity of doctrinal feeling. Those Christians who put their Jewish patriotism above their Christian faith did not give up their favorite idea concerning the privilege of Israel. This doctrine was part, so to speak, of their flesh and blood; it was one of the constituent elements of their faith, it was identified in their thoughts with the Christian doctrine. They seemed to have let the baptism at Caesarea pass as a miraculous exception, not as a rule. Who knows but that more than one bore a grudge against Peter on account of his vision, looked on him as a dreamer and visionary. In any case, heedless that Peter had spoken, they calmly persevered in their contention that one could not become a Christian without first becoming a naturalized Jew.

Such was the situation when one day there came to Jerusalem news far more serious than that of the baptism of a single family of gentiles. It was told that in Antioch, in that great city which was the queen of the East, some of the faithful were preaching the Gospel to Gentiles and receiving them into communion through baptism without any other initiation. Converting into a rule the exception of Caesarea, they were not imposing the Jewish rite on these new converts, they were not making them observe the fundamental distinction between clean and unclean food, they were dispensing them from all the precepts of the Law, they were surrendering the heritage of Israel to children who did not want Israel as a father. And to make it clear that they meant to inaugurate a new tradition and break with the past, they were taking a name never before in use among the faithful, a name that had been recently coined at Antioch: they were calling themselves Christians!

This time the scandal was great. It was impossible to blind themselves further:—the innovators of Antioch were overthrowing the whole hierarchical order in the relations among nations, they were abolishing the privilege of Israel, and compelling the people of God to mingle henceforth with the crowd of newcomers of every descent who were about to invade the Church. Were these innovators to triumph, it would be a seeming abandonment of the Christians of the first hour who formed the nucleus of the faithful and among whom were the most devoted disciples of Christ; to say the least it would be for them a very bitter humiliation.

Council of Jerusalem imposes solution.

All the outraged feelings of patriotism, all the passions of self-love, and, perhaps, also of self-interest, were let loose against the school of Antioch which was but applying the rule of faith established by the Supreme Pontiff. Zealots hurried to the capital of Syria to oppose the propaganda of these disturbers and to persuade the new converts that there was no salvation for them unless to their baptism they added the practice of the Law. But at Antioch the emissaries came in contact with a force they did not know. Paul, the greatest genius of rising Christianity, showed himself in all his power. Sent by the community of Antioch to Jerusalem to explain his position to the apostles, Paul set out with Barnabas for the Holy City and then took place that solemn assembly of the apostles and the disciples, known to historians as the Council of Jerusalem. The momentous question was presented and, as was to be expected, it was decided in the way that Providence itself had pointed out in the vision of Joppe. At this meeting Peter spoke with power and dignity and, indeed, showed himself, to the eyes of all, the infallible head of the Church of God. Stretching out his hand to the Apostle of the nations, he took under his protection the victim of the fanatics, proclaimed his orthodoxy before the whole Church; he sealed with him that fraternal union which time has consecrated into a glorious partnership—making them the household gods of the new Rome. Not less decisive was the attitude of James the Just, the most orthodox and pious of the Jews, on whom all the reactionaries relied, who spoke in accordance with Peter and threw the weight of his unequalled prestige in support of the much disparaged innovations. After the discussion, the First Council flung open the doors of the Church to the nations in this sublime declaration: "It hath seemed good to the Holy Ghost and to us, to lay no further burden upon you than the necessary things."

The Council of Jerusalem had saved Christianity, but it had sacrificed Judaism. In deciding that the Church would be Catholic, that is to say, international, it had killed the national pretensions of the Jewish clique. Then ended forever the time-honored dream in which the seers had seen the children of Israel seated on the very steps of the throne whence the Messias ruled all the nations of the earth. But it was to be a "spiritual Israel," a symbolic Sion that the prophets had announced; strangers were taking the place of the children of the family at the banquet; from the stones by the roadside God was raising up children to Abraham. Thus at last the hidden meaning of the Scripture was revealed. More than one Christian Jew must have said to himself that God was not fulfilling the promise made to Abraham and to Jacob, that He was repelling the people with whom He had an everlasting covenant and that He was covering with shame the daughter of Sion. Many of them, like the captive Hebrews at Babylon, sat and wept bitter tears as they remembered dispossessed Sion. "Upon the rivers of Babylon, there we sat and wept: when we remembered Sion." Ps., CXXXVI., 1. Let us greet with respect this patriotic grief than which there is scarcely any more exalted, but let us not forget that the cause of the Church was superior to that of Israel, and that the interests of humanity go before those of country. Some of the Christian Jews were not resigned. After the Council of Jerusalem, they continued their desperate opposition to the teachings of the Church, to the definitions that she had promulgated, to the apostolate of the Gentiles. Clinging obstinately to the old national prejudices which they identified with orthodoxy, they soon became but a small refractory sect cast upon the road to heresy. The catastrophe in which Jerusalem perished some years later drowned their opposition in a deluge of blood and was, to the Christian Jews, a decisive revelation which came to confirm that of Joppe. After this it was plain that Israel was no longer the people of God, but a rejected nation. It is no longer worth while to fix upon it the attention of history.

First turning point in Church's history.

As for the Church, she had just separated her cause from the precarious destiny of a nation. She had refused to espouse the cause of the petty contingencies of history so as not to fail in her universal mission. Peter's bark had cut the rope that bound it to port and was gaining the high seas where, without doubt, there awaited it storms, but also miraculous draughts of fishes. Such was the first turning point in the history of the modern world.
The Church and the Barbarians

Christianity becomes religion of Roman Empire.

Thenceforth there was nothing to prevent Christianity from becoming the religion of the Roman Empire, that is, of all the nations grouped under the shadow of the Roman civilization. For indeed what were all the other dangers awaiting the Church compared to the danger which had nearly destroyed her on the threshold of life? The bloody persecutions which marked the three centuries of her early life proved no obstacle to her growth. It is true that the fury of her persecutors spilled the blood of multitudes of her children; but this blood, in accordance with the expression of an apologist, was a seed of marvelous fecundity. After three hundred years of a war of extermination, the Roman Empire had to acknowledge itself conquered by its victim and had to surrender to her its arms. By the edict of Milan, promulgated in 312, Emperor Constantine the Great proclaimed that henceforth all might adore God as they wished. This was recognizing implicitly the right of Christianity to exist. But it is the glorious privilege of the Catholic Church that she needs naught but the common right in order that she may conquer the universe. As soon as liberty of conscience was established, the Roman world in its entirety asked for admission into the communion of the faithful, and before the fourth century had drawn to a close the pagans saw themselves reduced to the state of a discouraged minority. Christianity had become the religion of the emperors, the religion of the provinces; its limits were co-extensive with those of the Empire. There were Christian communities on the borders of the Rhine and of the Danube, as well as on the banks of the Euphrates and of the Nile; there were Christian communities in Colchis as well as in the Isle of Britain; and the Christian religion was sufficiently designated when it was called the Roman religion.

Christianity linked with Roman civilization.

Thus the humble sect of the Galileans held the throne of the Caesars and its future was linked with the destinies of the eternal civilization. Truly, the powerful constitution of the Roman Empire seemed well fitted to last for all time. Such was the universal belief; and never did a patriotic dogma rally more enthusiastic and more sincere adherents than the creed of all Roman citizens, which found expression in those proud words: the eternity of the Empire! This formula recurs in the verses of the poets, in the prayers of the faithful, in the panegyrics of the orators, and even in the text of the laws. Rome, in the language of its pagan worshipers, was called the Eternal City, and Christianity, in borrowing this appellation from the civil language, did not wish, at least in the beginning, to modify its traditional sense.

This goes to show that the Christians had adopted without misgiving the common belief in the eternity of the Roman civilization. Whatever the pretensions of their persecutors, the Christians were not less patriotic than the pagans, though in another way, and their religious belief contained nothing contrary to their convictions as citizens. Nay more, they found in their sacred volumes passages which seemed to confirm this conviction in a marvelous manner. For what was that fourth and last empire foretold by Daniel, and compared to iron to symbolize its indestructible duration, but the Roman Empire? This belief in the eternity of the Roman Empire was, in a way, part and parcel of their faith; in fact, it was adduced by the first apologists as an unanswerable proof of their patriotism. "How", said one of them, "could we desire the end of the Empire, since thereby we would desire the end of the world?"

Barbarians capture Rome.

But dark clouds were gathering slowly on the horizon, disturbing the serenity of the world and announcing the catastrophe of the morrow. The Barbarians, strangers to Christianity and to civilization, excluded from the Roman felicity, were prowling like wolves about the sunny domain of the Empire. Rome, having tried to subdue them, at last came to the conclusion that its hour for new conquests was past and that it would never triumph over them by force of arms. The time came when the Barbarians were supplying her with soldiers and it was among them that she recruited her staunchest defenders. Germany was to antiquity what Switzerland has been to modern Europe:—a land of lansquenets. Every year, crossing the Rhine or the Alps, the warriors of that country came in bands to hire out the work of their muscular arms to the generals of the Empire. Lovers of sunshine, of wealth, of voluptuousness, they came in quest of fortune and sometimes they found the crown. History records the names of some of these adventurers. One was Maximinus, a type of colossal brute, who under Septimus Severus, ran for hours at a time alongside the chariot of the emperor; later he murdered the Emperor Alexander and usurped his throne. Another was Odoacer. We meet him first in history when, on his way to Italy to sell his services to the Empire, he stopped at the entrance of the hut of a far-famed and kindly hermit of Norica, now Bavaria. A Barbarian of gigantic stature, he had to stoop to cross the threshold of the hut of the saintly old man whom he wished to greet in passing. A few years later this hireling was king of Italy.

How did the Empire act towards these men whom it could no longer subdue, and of whose services it had incessant need? It concluded that it should rally them to its cause, not by paying them for the blood they would shed for it, but by assimilating them gradually, by making true Romans of them and by handing them over to the Church to make them Christians. This seemed comparatively easy. The Roman civilization was not an exclusive world; it was thrown wide open to any Barbarian who was willing to serve it; and it had sufficient attraction to induce him to exchange his savagery for the Roman life. And in this way, by a sort of tacit agreement, there was worked out the transfusion of the Germanic world into the Roman world:—the former, little by little, took possession of the latter, whilst the latter in turn assimilated the former. It was the peaceful triumph of civilization, superior to all armed conquests. For was it not a triumphant proof of the eternity of the Roman civilization, that a Stilicho (*) and an Aetius (1) gained victories in its name, that a victorious Ataulph (2) proclaimed the grandeur of Rome in peninent accents, that Theodoric the Great (3) continued the work of the Emperors?

(*) Stilicho, a brave Vandal, shared in the military exploits of Emperor Theodosius (379-395), twice defeated Alaric, king of the Visigoths, and compelled him to abandon Italy. In 405 he conquered the German tribes which had invaded Italy under the leadership of the Ostrogoth Radahais.

In this way the Empire held, towards the Barbarians, the attitude Israel had maintained towards the Gentiles. Rome could form no conception of a community of nations save under the Roman form and with Rome at its head. Allow me another comparison which will present my thought in a more striking manner. The European of to-day cannot imagine that our modern civilization may perish; it does not occur to him that one day the deep masses of Asiatic people or unorganized hordes of anarchists may destroy it with-

(1) Aetius was the son of an Italian mother and Gaudentius, a Scythian soldier of the Empire. In the summer of 450 Aetius, in concert with the brave and loyal Theodoric, king of the Ostrogoths, relieved Orleans besieged by Attila, and arrested the progress of the great Hun on the Catalaunian Fields, near Troyes, where he won one of the decisive victories of history and saved Europe for Latins, Teutons, Celts and Slavs, against the degraded and odious Huns.

(2) Ataulph, brother and successor to Alaric, chieftain of the Visigoths, pillaged Rome, but later became reconciled with the Emperor and was commissioned to drive the Barbarians from Spain. He was assassinated at Barcelona before he had completed his task.

(3) Theodoric the Great, descendant of the royal Ostrogoth family of the Amali. At eighteen, in 489, he led a great horde of his countrymen into Italy, where he destroyed the kingdom of Odoacer in 495 and became the sole ruler of Italy.
out at the same time unchaining chaos; (*) such an eventuality would be, in his opinion, the end of all social life, the return of mankind to the darkness of primeval savagery. Well then, the Roman of the fourth century had a view-point very similar—with just this difference, that, for him, modern civilization was the Roman Empire.

The Christian Romans see in fall of Rome end of civilization.

Thus, for the second time, the destinies of the Church were linked with those of a human institution. Just as the Christian Jews were firmly convinced that the future of Christianity was indissolubly united with the future of their own people, so the Christian Romans imagined that their future was one with the future of the Empire. The Empire, indeed, was civilization itself; it was felicity, it was the perfection of social life, and its chief—in the solemn language of that day—bore the title of Prince of the Human Race. Identified with the Empire, the Christian Church, by that very fact, seemed identified with the whole human race. She apparently had attained her ideal, with nothing more to ask of future centuries, and it seemed that it should be her chief concern to preserve the prevailing conditions.

* Since this was written, the events which have taken place or which are in preparation in the extreme Orient may have modified the ideas of some. If I mistake not, everyone is not absolutely convinced of the impossibility of a new Attila or of a new Genghis Khan, who, equipped with the perfected tools of modern warfare, might throw upon the Western World five hundred million men of the yellow race. —G. K.

Bearing in mind this universal view-point of the Romans, we may imagine their feelings as the trend of events, instead of pointing to the fulfillment of their dreams, seemed, on the contrary, to foreshadow the destruction of the Empire by the Barbarians. Every day they saw increase the number of these hirelings who became their plague. Of gigantic stature, powerful of limb, untidy, red-haired, with unkempt beard, their legs covered with rags, ill-smelling, and, moreover, coarse, brutal, ignorant, talking a hoarse and unintelligible jargon, they spread everywhere, treated the Provinces as their own possession, disregarding wholly the Roman mode of living, taking from it only its pleasures, for the rest holding to their own ways without any intention of change. A day indeed came—a day of shame and of mourning such as the world had never known—when the savage hordes captured the Eternal City. Then was the sanctuary of civilization violated in a most sacrilegious manner; and men had a foretaste of the end of all things!

And indeed to them the end of the Roman civilization was the end of the world. If all that is beautiful in life—style, wealth, well-being, public games, literature, arts, refined social manners—was to be suppressed; and if a flood of barbarism was to be let loose upon a world, radiant, charming, thrilling with the joy of life, would it not mean death to the human race itself? Thus they all said and felt. For to admit for a single moment that the human race could get along without the Roman civilization, and that the future of the former was not indissolubly connected with the prosperity of the latter, was an absurd and impossible thought which no one entertained.

Accordingly, when undeniable signs announced to them the fall of that civilization, the true Romans could but desire death. Some wished to fall in a last intoxication at the banquet of civilization, crowned with roses and drunk with wine; others, wrapped in the folds of the old Roman flag, awaited the fatal blow with stoic despair, even as the senators of yore, seated in their curule chairs, awaited the arrival of the Gallic conqueror. All perished with their ideal, incapable of conceiving any other, witnessing the crash of heaven and of their gods. There are no more tragic sorrows than these, because they touch humanity in those things which it loves and admires the most. All realities may fail so long as the ideal stands; if the ideal also proves false, not only is the heart broken, but the mind is shattered, and the intellect casts itself headlong into nothingness with a cry of utter despair.
In similar crises it is with a fresh outburst of fanaticism that the vanquished meet the sentence of destiny. This was particularly the case with the Romans of Britain. Located at the border of the civilized world and abandoned by Rome at an early hour, they saw the Anglo-Saxon invasion spread gradually, pushing them back from day to day towards the West, crushing civilization in the portions of the country they had invaded, and choking it in the rest of the land. Entrenched in their fierce patriotism, no longer understanding anything of the progress of the world, they could but protest. Christians themselves, they were not willing that their conquerors should be called to the blessings of the Gospel, and their priests refused to communicate to the newcomers the light of the Gospel, unwilling as they were to admit that one could be both Christian and Anglo-Saxon, just as the Jews had been unwilling that one should be Christian and uncircumcised. They did not realize that in converting their conquerors they would save themselves; they preferred to perish whilst hating them, rather than to live reconciled with them. It is the eternal cry of fanaticism:—'rather Turk than Papist'. The Armenians of to-day realize the significance of such a wish.

Catholic Church sees in Barbarian movement birth of new civilization.

If the Catholic Church had not understood her role better than the Briton clergy, if she had not risen above the resentments of blind patriotism, Christianity would not have survived, but would have sunk into the abyss along with the Roman Empire. But the Church had a steadier eye and a calmer mind; she did not despair of humanity, she did not believe that all was lost because Rome was doomed. She viewed the gigantic movement as a whole, and discovered in it the birth of a world as yet unknown. She foresaw the sublime novelty which then could have been expressed only by a monstrous coupling of words, the Barbarian civilization, that is, a civilization that could get on without Rome, and which would go farther than Rome. And, undaunted, conscious of her eternal mission, she went to those who were then the heralds of destiny, and, her hand in theirs, she took the road of the future.

I have explained elsewhere the genesis of the movement which was to draw the Catholic Church in this direction:—this movement is identified with the name of the greatest Doctor of the Latin Church, St. Augustine. () Let it suffice to state here that this movement, conceived in the thought of a man of genius and nurtured by his disciples, found, from the end of the fifth century, laborers who carried it from the purely intellectual domain into that of historical realities. On the one hand, the Gallic episcopacy represented by men like St. Remigius of Rheims and St. Avitus of Vienne, sincerely adherent to the domination of the Barbarians, asked them only to become Christians, and thus bravely renounced the chimerical dream of continuing the Roman civilization. On the other hand, the Papacy, in the person of the greatest man of the sixth century, St. Gregory the Great, took the initiative in the conversion of the Anglo-Saxons, thus fulfilling, from his palace in Rome, the task which the Celtic Church of Britain had disdained to assume. Everywhere, without imposing conditions, the Catholic Church unlocked the gates of her sanctuaries and opened the road of salvation to the new nations. Thus is explained her prodigious success during the sixth century with all the Barbarians, whether Arian () or pagan. When these became convinced that they could carry the sweet yoke of Christ without submitting to the heavy yoke of Rome, their prejudices against the Catholic Faith fell to the ground, and its natural superiority over heresy, as well as over paganism, found no longer any obstacle. Joyfully the Barbarian world, whole

(*) See Author's Introduction to Clovis, 2 edit. vol. I, p. XXV.

(*) The Arians were followers of Arius, a priest of Alexandria in Egypt, who denied the divinity of Christ. Arianism spread far and wide. Arian kingdoms arose in Spain, Africa, Italy. Arianism was condemned at the Council at Nicaea, near Constantinople, in 325 and became extinguished before the eighth century.
and entire, entered into the Church. The peoples became converted as a whole. In less than three centuries all the Germanic nations were won over to Catholicism. More time had been required to convert the Empire, notwithstanding the enormously superior advantages it offered to the apostolate.

The second turning point in Church's history.

We have now passed the second turning point of history, which was inaugurated by the baptism of Clovis. (1) This baptism has often been compared to that of Constantine. (2) I would say that it matches, in a remarkable way, the baptism of the centurion Cornelius. Then, the Church, separating her cause from that of the people of Israel, had gone to the nations and had received them into the Christian community without imposing upon them the obligations of the Judaic Law. This time,

(1) Clovis, (466-511), the founder of the Merovingian line of Frankish kings, married the Christian princess Clotilda in 493, defeated the Alemanni in 496. He was baptized by Saint Remigius the same year in fulfillment of a vow made in battle to the God of Clotilda. As in the case of Constantine the Great the baptism of Clovis led to a rapid diffusion of the Christian religion among his subjects.

(2) Constantine the Great, son of Constantine Chlorus joint-emperor with Galerius, in 312 marched upon Maxentius, the worthless ruler of Rome, and defeated him in the battle of the Milvian Bridge. Before this battle, according to the testimony of Constantine, as recorded by Eusebius a contemporaneous historian, a fiery cross appeared in the sky with this inscription: "In touto nika." ("In this sign conquer.") Constantine publicly ascribed the victory to the God of the Christians and was the first Roman Emperor to receive Christian baptism.
detaching her destinies from those of the Empire, she went to the Barbarians and put into their hands the scepter of the world without requiring them to wear the dress of the Roman civilization. On both occasions, it was a stroke of strategy of the same superior order. On both occasions, Christianity, the common patrimony of all humanity, had escaped utter destruction. Instead of weeping on the graves of extinct civilizations, Christianity had busied herself with winning to the faith of Christ the nascent communities. She had thus indicated in a precise and explicit manner, and for all centuries to come, that, as she is created to spread the kingdom of God on earth, she cannot identify herself with any of those ephemeral things which are called dynasty, nation, social class, civilization. Having become the universal religion at this price, it is at this price also that she will remain such and continue to make a reality of that sublime epithet given to the Messiah: the Father of the world to come.
The Church and Feudalism

Letting the dead bury their dead, letting crumble behind her the molding edifice of Roman civilization, the Catholic Church, true to her mission, went to the Barbarians and confided to them her destiny. Established in their midst, she chose from them co-laborers, such as St. Boniface (1), Charlemagne (2),

(1) St. Boniface, Apostle of Germany, Benedictine Monk, was born in England, May 15, 719. Pope Gregory II gave him full authority to preach the Gospel to the heathens in Germany to the right of the Rhine. When he saw the great results of his labors, he returned to Rome in 722, and was consecrated bishop. Ten years later he was appointed Archbishop with authority to set up bishoprics among the peoples he converted. He drew up a code of laws for the government of the Church in the country. When he had finished his work in Germany he undertook to evangelize the Frisians by whom he was martyred.

(2) Charlemagne (742-814), Emperor of the West and King of the West Franks, was a great patron of letters. Under his reign, notwithstanding continual wars, he established schools throughout his empire. He invited from England Alcuin (A. D. 804), a distinguished scholar and pupil of the Venerable Bede, under whose direction academies were established. The sons of the more wealthy flocked to his lectures. Alcuin spoke Latin, Greek and Hebrew, was master of philosophy, theology, history and mathematics. Under his direction the schools of the Empire became celebrated and scholars from all Europe came to learn wisdom at his feet. The impulse thus given to letters by Charlemagne was continued by his successors. The statues of Constantine the Great and Charlemagne grace the vestibule of St. Peter's in Rome.
Alfred the Great (1), and from the very first set herself to the task of bringing forth a new world.

It was a gigantic project, a work of centuries. It would be inspiring and profitable to consider the undertaking in detail; but this is not the place to trace a sketch of it— that I have done elsewhere. (2) My aim is rather to show how, in the course of her work, the Church was in danger of falling victim to the Barbarian she sought to civilize, and how she finally succeeded in her task.

Generosity of Barbarians to Church.

One must realize what kind of men were these new peoples, who had just bowed their heads under the waters of baptism, in the first centuries of the Middle Ages. With the exception of a few chosen ones, they were still only on the threshold of Christianity and, though baptized, were far from being civilized. They sincerely loved the Christian religion, but their love for it was often crude and sordid. In their eyes, there were two ways for a disciple of Christ to give proof of his faith: to deal vigorous blows to its enemies, and to make large benefactions to its poor. It was their belief—as it is ours—that charity covers a multitude of sins. And as they had many sins to be forgiven, they showed themselves very generous towards the Church. Nothing more meritorious. The Church was the mother and the nurse of the poor. To give to her was not only to contribute to the maintenance of worship and to the needs of the active ministry, it was to assure the budget of charity and of public instruction of which the Church had the sole charge. Behold how, “for the salvation of their souls and for the remission of their sins,” as they loved to state in their acts of donation, the men of that time were pleased to endow religious institutions or to found new ones. There was not a monastery, there was not a cathedral or collegiate church which had not received largesses at their hands and which they had not made, in a short time, owner of valuable property, invested with all the social prestige which rich estates gave in those days. More than one of these establishments became in this manner a real power, especially from the days when kings, outdoing the nobles in their liberality, actually divided their authority with the Church and granted her in fief entire counties, with all the political and civil rights, and made her prelates temporal princes, the first personages of the state after themselves.

(1) Alfred the Great (A.D. 849-899), king of the West Saxons in England. He freed the country of the Danish invaders, codified and promulgated laws, founded monasteries, brought learned men from other lands, gave proof of his own learning by translating several important works into Anglo-Saxon.

(2) See Author's "Origines de la Civilisation Moderne," 6th edition. The translator of these pages is at present (in 1924), engaged in putting into an English dress this the favorite work of Godfrey Kurth.
Europe became covered with ecclesiastical principalities, veritable buttresses of the thrones which had created them.

Secular interference with Church affairs.

But so much wealth and prestige, far from being a real power, became on the contrary a supreme danger to the Church. I do not speak here of the violences pure and simple of the depredators, which were, after all, incontestable crimes against right and public order. There is question of a more universal and deeper evil. At once opulent and unarmed, the Church was obliged to confide to lay hands the sword which the State had given her; and because she lacked an hereditary dynasty she was subject to all kinds of rivalry whenever a benefice became vacant. Thus the Church very soon became the plaything of the ambitious and the prey of rival factions. Even those who, in their hours of recollection or repentance, had shown themselves the most generous towards her, did not hesitate to dispose of her dignities, persuading themselves that the liberalities they had bestowed upon her gave them a right of tutelage or protectorate over her. All the great ones were on the watch at the death-beds of bishops or abbots to contend for the vacant inheritance. Having cadets to place and not wishing to endow them with their own possessions, lest they should reduce the share of the eldest son, they conceived the idea of putting the burden of their support on the shoulders of the Church, by making them bishops or abbots. The ecclesiastical hierarchy thus became a dumping ground for numerous families and the Church became, in a way, an institution of employment for the cadets of good families.

On the other hand it was to the interest of kings that ecclesiastical dignities should be given only to reliable and faithful persons. In feudal society the political influence acquired by dioceses and monasteries was too important to leave kings indifferent to the recruitment of the hierarchy. Again these rich grants were for them excellent means of government, which they used to reward the fidelity of some, to stimulate the zeal of others. They were not slow, then, contrary to the canons of the Church, in acquiring almost everywhere the habit of personally selecting the titulares of the principal ecclesiastical dignities in their kingdom. The kings of Germany did more: they arrogated to themselves, towards the middle of the tenth century, the nomination of the Sovereign Pontiffs, so that during about a hundred years (963-1073) no pope could ascend the see of Peter who had not been designated or at least agreed on by them.

We should inspect this regime at close range. When a bishop died, his chapter at once took possession of the insignia of his priestly dignity:—the ring, which represents his marriage to his diocese, and the crosier, which is the symbol of his authority over his flock, and sent them to the king! But no matter how the messengers hastened on their errand, they were preceded by other travelers quicker than themselves; these were the ambitious ones who dreamed of settling in the vacant chair and who had hurried to the royal court to plead their cause. This was the steeple-chase of candidates for the episcopacy. I leave it to the reader to imagine the numberless intrigues, wire-pullings, solicitations, promises, enticing offers made to the more influential courtiers, the selling of influence to the highest bidder, the extraordinary interventions which took place. All this scheming was kept up until they learned that the monarch had made his selection. The lucky candidate was then sent for, and, in a distinctively feudal ceremony, received at the hands of the king the crosier and the ring. There was no longer anything canonical in the whole procedure, there was no longer anything ecclesiastical in the ceremony; the investiture, that is to say, the act by which the new bishop was supposed to be endowed with his powers, was exclusively a lay ceremony.

Lay investiture.

Bear in mind this word lay investiture—it was to become famous in history; it was to be the watchword of the regime. And, meanwhile, note also the character of the relations which henceforth were to exist between Church and State. The great evangelical principle of the distinction of the powers, which is the cornerstone of modern civilization, was violated in the most flagrant manner. The spiritual and temporal were confounded. No longer was there rendered to God what belonged to God. It would seem that it was the emperor, and no longer the pope, who was vicar of Jesus Christ. The Church was thus but an annex to the State; the feudal system had enriched her, but it had also enslaved her. It had stripped her of her ecumenical character to make her an institution of caste. The pope was nothing but an imperial chaplain. The bishops were but court chaplains:—the hierarchy was open only to the scions of great families. There arose an ecclesiastical feudalism as there was a military feudalism—both recruited from the same class. The Church leaned upon the powerful ones of the world; she shared their wealth and their authority; it would seem that her destinies were linked indissolubly to those of feudalism. One might say that like the people of Israel, like the Roman Empire, feudalism had wished to dominate the Church, and that, more fortunate than these, it had succeeded.

Evil results of Lay Investiture.
This situation was grave beyond precedent, both for the welfare of the Church herself and for her influence upon the nations. From the moment the choice of prelates, instead of being regulated by rigorous canonical prescriptions, depended solely on the arbitrary power of the kings, it was no longer priestly virtue which opened the ranks of the episcopate. The great question was to give to the sovereign guarantees of fidelity to his dynasty and to his politics, or to be endorsed by his courtiers. But the courtiers no longer gave their protection gratuitously; they sold it. Most of the bishops, therefore, bought their office, and, naturally, once they had acquired it, they endeavored to indemnify themselves by selling in their turn the dignities of secondary order. The inferior clergy, on their side, in order to re-imburse themselves, sold the sacraments, and in this manner, from the top to the bottom of the ladder, the grace of the redemption was sold at auction. The temple of God out of which Jesus had driven the sellers had become a den of thieves.

But, of all abuses, this kind of traffic was the one the Church condemned the most severely, and the one against which she had formulated most of her anathemas. From the dawn of Christianity, she had indignantly stigmatized it—from the day when Simon the magician offered money to St. Peter to obtain the power of imposition of hands, and drew from the Prince of the Apostles this thundering reply: "Keep thy money to thyself to perish with thee!" (*) From that day on the name of simony has been given to traffic in sacred things, and all generations have renewed the prohibition of this sacrilegious practice.

And, of course, a simoniacal clergy did not worry much about the virtues of its vocation. Having entered Holy Orders, for the most part, in order to obtain a suitable position, they enjoyed the good things of life, indulged in high living, took part in all worldly distractions, festivities, games, hunting, and even war. A very large number of priests showed their love for the sacraments by receiving two that are incompatible: Holy Orders and Matrimony! They lived openly as fathers of families, surrounded by their wives and children, and they considered celibacy an antiquated custom no longer to be observed. Needless to say these pretended marriages, forbidden by canon law, were in the eyes of the Church nothing but shameful concubinages.

You may imagine the influence which a clergy so degraded could exert upon the people whom it was their duty to instruct and uplift. The most powerful of all teaching is example:—but their example taught the people to trample under foot, with cynicism or without conscience, the most formal precepts of the religion of which they were the ministers. We who, by the grace of God, live in a time when the clergy, by the admirable dignity of their lives, bear testimony to the truth of their teachings, can hardly imagine the sad condition of the faithful of those days, who saw the priesthood invaded by men who lived in concubinage and who were traffickers in the sacraments. When luxury and venality had their seats in the sanctuary and talked from the pulpits, what could be the feelings of the hearers? Christ said to His first priests: “You are the salt of the earth. But if the salt lose its savor, wherewith shall it be salted?” These words found a sad application in the society of those days. Social progress had come to a standstill, and the Christian world went backwards. Some of the faithful—and these the more barbarous—quietly followed in the footsteps of their pastors and plunged into the mire of all vices; others—and these the more logical—turned away with disgust from a religion which they saw represented by such ministers. Both classes were, so to say, ripe for a religious revolution which would have snatched them away from the influence of Christianity. Heresy could confidently knock at their door:—it was sure to find admission.

Albigensian heresy.
And indeed, from the beginning of the eleventh century we see heresy everywhere—and such heresy! A doctrine disastrous, lugubrious, horrible as sin and as death! A dark night which came down with the weight of lead and with the coldness of ice upon the mind and upon the heart, a chancre of death which ate at all the luminous and elevated faculties of the human soul, a deadly folly that choked the joy of living and made existence here below like a bad dream:—such was the heresy of the Albigenses! Compare it not to any other heresy:—all others left standing the sacred banner of hope, kept the faith in Christ the Redeemer, maintained in the souls of men the high and manly conviction that life is worth living, that the struggle between good and evil will finally close in keeping with the demands of human conscience. According to the Albigensian heresy, on the contrary, there was certainty of salvation, neither through the Church which they held worthy of all contempt, nor through the Redeemer who according to them had been subject to the law of sin, nor through the law of God who in their opinion was not almighty, but opposed by an evil principle whose power equaled His own. Instead of the harmony, the equilibrium, the order, which the Christian faith sees in the rule of the Divine Wisdom throughout the universe, the Albigensian perceived nothing but an atrocious struggle between good and evil, fighting for possession of the world in a duel, whose tragical stake was the soul of man.

The Albigensian held that the Christian faith was vain and the Redemption but a lure; that evil was an eternal principle and that the created world, with all its splendors, was its work. He maintained that it was man’s own fault if he was composed of a soul and a body—the soul the work of the good god, and the body the work of the evil god. The soul, he said, had been lured into the body by the seductions of the evil god; it was imprisoned there, and its only hope of salvation was to leave it at any cost. Hence suicide was a religious act, since it liberated the soul; hence marriage was to be disapproved because, by reproduction, it perpetuated indefinitely the captivity of souls in the bodies. One sees here collective suicide, the monstrous tenet of a modern philosophy, vaguely advocated as the only solution.

Such were the leading features of the pernicious doctrine which dried up the supernatural life of humanity at its source and plunged the human conscience into the dread darkness whence Christ had called it unto the light of the Redemption. Alas! the men of that epoch must have felt sorely forsaken, sorely disabused of the Christian ideal or they would not, in their despair, have cast themselves in so large numbers into the arms of such a religion! And yet day by day it spread wider and wider. Like one of those deadly scourges which in the past came from Asia, it advanced little by little: the historian can follow on the map the progress of its itinerary of death covering every land as with a pall.

It is called the Albigensian heresy, and we know for a fact that at a certain moment its principle forces were concentrated about Albi in the South of France. But have no illusion on the subject, it was everywhere. It was in the north, at Arras, at Liége and in the center of France, at Châlons, at Orléans, that it exhibited its most ancient manifestations. Hidden often under the most inoffensive exterior, it was difficult to recognize it at first sight in any particular sect; of harmless appearance, as in the case of the earlier Waldenses () it gradually and fatally invaded all centers where the disappearance of Catholic faith had left a void, and legions of men lived under its shadow, never realizing that the mutilated Christianity of which they made profession was but a branch of the Manichean trunk. All the sects of that time were like so many lateral canals which discharged their waters into the central sewer of Manicheism (). Directly or indirectly, all the other heresies were its tributaries. They swarmed everywhere. A thousand extravagant and scandalous sects sprang into existence, hideous vermin which covered the poor sick body of society. Among a populace on the verge of frenzy, but still feeling the need of religion, the fiercest of heresiarchs, the vilest of charlatans found a welcome and a hearing. As proof if this I mention the wretch, Tanchelm, who had chosen the city of Antwerp as his field of operation. Such was the fanatical enthusiasm of his followers that—excuse the repugnant detail—they went the length of drinking the water in which he had washed himself. One day he announced that he was going to marry the Blessed Virgin and that he had placed an offering box on either side of the door at the house where the ceremony was to take place; he wished to know—from the liberality they would show in filling them—which of his followers, men or women, were the more devoted to him. Both boxes were filled.

(*) The Waldenses derived their name from Peter Waldo, a rich merchant of Lyons, who gathered around him a number of followers and sent them out two by two to preach in the country districts about Lyons (A. D. 1170). Alexander III praised their zeal, but recommended that they should not interfere with the duties of the clergy. They paid no attention to this advice and were excommunicated at the Council Verona (A. D. 1184). Their rebellion against the Church naturally led the Waldenses into heresy.

If, as I have said a while ago, it is not always easy to detect the hidden relationship (*) Manicheism was propagated by Manes, who was born in Persia in 240. He announced himself as a new apostle of Jesus Christ and proclaimed the existence of two eternal principles—a good and an evil principle.

which connected all the sects of the time with the leading heresy, there was nevertheless a very apparent family trait among them all;—and that was their boundless aversion for the clergy. And this brings us back, by a round-about way that has not failed to be instructive, to the origin which I have assigned to this dreadful inundation of heresy:—the corruption of the clergy. It was the scandal of simoniacal and concubinary priests that opened the door through which the multitudes rushed headlong out of the Church.

Restoration of Christian spirit among clergy.

It might have seemed, accordingly, that Christianity and civilization were running into bankruptcy. But the Catholic Church is made for eternal renewals. Sometimes it might appear that the sources of grace and of life coming down upon her from the heavenly heights lose themselves and run waste in the distance; but, no!—at a given moment they gush forth from her bosom in columns so much the higher for having been buried the deeper, to spread about her in refreshing and life-giving streams. And this was what men actually saw in those dark days. The inexhaustible vitality of the Church, under the impure flood of heresy, withdrew and concentrated towards her heart; there she drew a greater intensity and energy, and prepared to enter by vigorous pulsations into all the arteries and veins of this great suffering body.

Meanwhile she lived a refugee in the cloisters, those perpetual asylums of the persecuted Christian spirit. All the cloisters had not remained equally free from corruption, but, from the beginning of the tenth century, an active reform movement had originated in those of Lorraine and of Burgundy. Reformers had appeared who had dreamed of restoring to monastic life all its ideal perfection and who succeeded in their efforts. Thus at Gorey, at Brogne, at Cluny especially, there were centers of monastic reform and regeneration whose activities radiated into the distance. Cluny, which had the good fortune to have at its head for more than a century a succession of eminent men, has left its name to this movement. The disciples and the admirers of the Cluniac school carried its ideas and its reform into all the lands of Western Europe. To be just, one must note also the part in the work of reform due to the illustrious Italian ascetics, such as St. Romuald, the founder of the Camaldolese, St. John Gualbert, the founder of Vallombrosa, St. Nilus, who won over to the attraction of the religious life the Emperor Otho III himself, and who, perhaps, might have induced him to lay down the crown if death had not freed the young prince from this heavy burden.

All these monastic hearths, shining forth one after another like the stars of heaven, preserved and fed the sacred fire of the Christian spirit; they restored an atmosphere where all those who had held to the ideal of the gospel and who had not despaired of the future gathered to refresh themselves. The ranks of the Militant Church were formed anew about the monasteries; the secular clergy, in turn, furnished doctors and advocates to the cause of the reform. Such was the magnanimous Wazon, Bishop of Liége, the first to define with absolute precision the principles which have been called Gregorian, but which it would suffice to call Catholic. Such again was the noble Anselm of Lucca, the great and exemplary bishop, who became pope under the name Alexander II, and who was destined to be one of the most deserving of the precursors of Gregory VII (*). And there were many others. They all had their eyes fixed on the Roman See; over the heads of the corrupt episcopacy, all asked of the pope the salvation of the world. To use the modern expression, they were ultramontane in the fullest sense of the word.

(*) Gregory VII (Hildebrand) was born in Italy, about 1020; died May 25, 1085. During the reign of Pope Leo IX he showed great executive ability and a burning desire for reform. At the death of Leo IX, asked by the people and clergy of Rome to become Pope, he had Victor II elected instead. During the reign of this Pontiff he steadily maintained and even increased the ascendancy which his commanding genius had acquired for him during the pontificate of Leo IX. At the death of Victor II Hildebrand secured the election of Nicholas II. The decree of election of Pope Nicholas by which the power of choosing the Pope is vested in the College of Cardinals was in a large measure the achievement of Hildebrand, whose power and influence had become supreme in Rome. At the obsequies of Alexander II, whom Hildebrand's influence had raised to the pontificate, a loud outcry from the whole multitude of clergy and people was heard: "Let Hildebrand be Pope!" On the same day Hildebrand was conducted to the Church of San Pietro in Vincoli, and there elected in canonical form by the assembled Cardinals.

Reforms demanded.

These men, scattered everywhere, lent the prestige of a life above reproach to elevated and pure doctrines; and little by little, they compelled public interest; it may be said that they formed public opinion in the centers where religious and social problems were discussed. Their activities were not confined to the ranks of the clergy; they recruited adherents from all classes of society, even from among the princes and the crowned heads. One of them was the powerful Emperor of Germany, Henry III, the pitiless opponent of simony and Nicolaitanism. No one has branded those abuses with more bitterness, no one has fought them with more vigor. He took care to intrust episcopal sees only to men above reproach, and those whom his influence raised to the chair of Peter—Clement II and Damasus II—were worthy of it beyond contradiction. This may seem strange on the part of a sovereign who more than any other held to his pretended right of lay investiture; but it is easy to explain. In human society, it is one thing to notice an abuse, and another thing to detect its source. The observations which we make at a distance—in the light of history and with all the documentary evidence under our eyes—could not have been made with the same facility by the people who lived in those days, who were in the midst of the fray, who saw only a portion of the facts and who, moreover, were inclined, by self-interest and by their condition in life, to see these facts in a different light. This is why there were in those days—as there are now—good people who, though lamenting the abuses of society, would have indignantly rejected the remedy, had it been proposed to them.

Difficulty of situation.

What was this remedy? As I have said before, it did not consist in the prohibition pure and simple of simony and concubinage. As long as they handed over episcopal sees to men given to simony and concubinage, their vices would occupy the sees with them. The true remedy was to prevent such men from penetrating by stratagem into the fold, from entering, as the saying is, otherwise than by the door. To this end it was necessary again to put in force the canonical prescriptions concerning the election of Church dignitaries; in other words, it was necessary to restore to the Church her liberty and to respect the distinction of the two powers by taking from the kings the power of investiture. This was very simple—it is the very simplicity of the idea that made it dreadful and made it appear chimerical. To deny to princes a privilege to which clung the best as well as the worst, would have let loose the most terrible of wars, a war which Christian society had not known to that day—the war between Church and State. And this war would have been not only a war against the kings but also a struggle against the feudal class, against all that rich and powerful society which supported and favored the Church in its own way, and without which it seemed that she would be doomed to absolute powerlessness. It would have provoked among the hierarchy itself a furious and desperate resistance on the part of all the prelates who owed their dignity to lay investiture and whose titles to possession would have become imperiled by the anathema cast upon their origin. These were frightful anticipations which of necessity disturbed the minds of the reformers. And it is not astonishing that more than one recoiled before such eventualities.

Tact of Leo IX. and successors.

Nevertheless the Catholic Church did not hesitate. But with what tact, with what prudence, with what caution did she proceed at first! To proclaim the true principles and to insist upon their application would have been useless, since they were not known; and it would have been dangerous, since they were not recognized. She did better:—little by little she re-acquainted the minds of the people to respect those principles, by affirming tacitly the right through precedents which she created when she had the power to do so, making those principles prevail, without show, indeed, but with all the more vigor. An example will show how this reform proceeded.

In 1048, the pontifical throne became vacant and the emperor Henry III designated as its incumbent his cousin Bruno, who was then bishop of Toul and who is known in history as Leo IX. He belonged to that group of zealous and fervent Christians who dreamed of the regeneration of the Church. He did not protest against his selection; he did not say to his cousin’s face that he had not the right to dispose of the chair of Peter, and that he, as a bishop, could not consider himself pope except he were elected by the clergy of Rome in accordance with the rules of Canon Law. Such language would have spoiled it all:—Henry III, angered, would have named another pope, who, probably, would have been more compliant and the great work of the reform would not have taken place. But what Leo IX did not express in words, he proclaimed by his conduct with not less power, and with more gentleness than if he had spoken. He at once set out to take possession of the pontifical see, but he left as a simple pilgrim, without retinue, staff in hand, praying and fasting on the way; he walked into Rome bare-footed and it was only after he had been elected in accordance with the rules of Canon Law that he donned the pontifical insignia and acted as the head of the Church. Thus lay investiture was quietly weakened by the very person who received it, and this without the least conflict. The two successors of Leo IX conformed to his example, and, after a few years, the idea of the liberty of the Apostolic See became so much a matter of course that, in 1059, Pope Nicholas II could take a further step and publish his celebrated constitution on the election of sovereign pontiffs.

Nicholas II regulates election of sovereign pontiffs.

This constitution was a model of energy and cleverness. On the one hand it loudly proclaimed the law and decreed that the pope should be elected by the college of cardinals; on the other hand, it wisely took cognizance of the facts and decided that the ruling emperor, and each of his successors to whom the Church would grant the privilege, should have the right to confirm the election. This concession—intended solely to take care of the transition period—soon fell into disuse, and the constitution of 1059 alone remained in force. It may be fitting to remark here that its dispositions are still in force; it was in accordance with them that the present Pope—Benedict XV—was elected and that his successor will be elected. All will admit that an electoral law which lasts for eight and a half centuries is a rather rare phenomenon of longevity, and one which it would be difficult to find outside of the Catholic Church.

Gregory VII. proscribes lay investiture.

Thus was the Papacy emancipated; it then put itself to the task of liberating the Church. This is its traditional mission, in accordance with the word spoken to Peter: "but thou being converted confirm thy brethren." All eyes were turned towards the Sovereign Pontiff; having seen him set free, the Christian world then asked him to act. From the bosom of the Church there arose weighty voices begging him to save society. St. Peter Damian, in a way, echoed them all. Dreadful hour! Painful hesitation! Would the Papacy rise to the occasion? Would it dare look the all powerful evil in the face, and, having viewed it from all angles, strike it down? Would it dare pronounce the supreme word which, once spoken, could not be revoked, the word which would be the signal for the universal conflagration? This question was asked at the moment when there had just ascended the Chair of Peter one who had been the soul of all reforms for a generation. He was known then as the Monk Hildebrand; to-day he is known as Pope Gregory VII. He stood there, on the border line between the past and the future, a man who separates the centuries. He stood ready, lance in hand, knowing that his action would be answered by a thousand confused and terrible cries—the noise either of a falling or of a resurgent world.

I imagine that when Pope Gregory was about to deliver the supreme stroke, he felt his hand tremble. This intrepid reformer—perhaps the most intrepid of men—must then have felt that sacred terror and weakening of the flesh which was not spared Jesus Himself in the Garden of Olives. There is nothing more august and more touching than the voluntary sacrifice made by those whom God has chosen to execute a great mission; they are conscious that they are to be its first victims, but nevertheless they act. Thus, when in 1075 Gregory VII formulated against lay investiture the prohibition which he accentuated in 1078 and in 1080, and when he forbade even kings and emperors to confer any religious dignity, he attained the acme of moral grandeur in his whole career. Never, neither in the passing éclat of his triumph, nor in the magnanimous patience displayed amid the tribulations of his exile, did Gregory VII do any thing more sublime than when he made this proclamation, which was about to plunge him into the abyss of endless trouble.

The war which was then kindled lasted fifty years, and neither Gregory VII nor Henry IV lived to see its end. I need not tell you its story—you will find its details in the textbooks of history; my task is to make you realize its bearing. It was a furious struggle, in which were engaged all Christian peoples, all classes of society. It deeply disturbed a world still young and passionate. It set loose an avalanche of pamphlets in which everything was attacked with a violence heretofore unknown in doctrinal debate. In the course of the conflict there were strange surrenders and strange and sudden changes, and shameful waverings in the most manly characters. The good cause, attacked with unprecedented fury, was often compromised by the extreme measures of its own defenders, and the revolutionary spirit was aided, more than once, by appearing to operate under the auspices of authority. And, in such encounters, the distracted conservatives could turn in anger to the Sovereign Pontiff, and say to him: "Behold your partisans, and behold your work!"

And, as often happens, they unscrupulously identified the reformers with the revolutionaries. As an instance of this we may cite that generous Catholic democracy of Milan, which was guided by St. Aリアルド and St.
Erlsembaldo, but which was branded by its opponents with the name of Cathari—a name, however, which it transformed into a title of honor. The storm which disturbed everything seemed to bring darkness into the minds of men and decadence into Christian society. The Papacy however remained undisturbed in the midst of the universal upheaval. Gregory VII died at Salerno, Victor III fled from Rome on the day of his consecration, Urban II prepared the first crusade in the midst of his struggles, Pascal II languished in the prisons of Henry V; but the Papacy, looking beneath the convulsions of the surface, saw arising the harvests of the future. Under the wind of the storm the truths which it had sown grew up in the conscience of the nations. The vital principles of Christianity little by little unfolded their conclusions in formulas of luminous and energetic precision, and slowly succeeded in taking possession of men’s minds. Leaning upon the elite of the regular and secular clergy, upheld by the ever growing adherence of the multitudes, served by pure devotedness—such as that of the Countess Mathilda of Tuscany, () known as the () Countess Mathilda of Tuscany, or of Canossa, 1046-1114, was finely educated, deeply religious and from her youth followed with interest the great ecclesiastical questions of the day. Her domains were of the greatest importance in the political and ecclesiastical disputes of the time, as the road from Germany to Rome, by way of upper Italy, passed through them. On the 22d of April, 1073, Gregory VII became pope and before long the great battle for the independence of the Church and the reform of ecclesiastical life began. In this contest Mathilda was the fearless, courageous, generous and unwavering ally of Gregory and his successors. It was at Mathilda’s mountain stronghold of Canossa that Henry IV. appeared before Gregory VII. and atoned for his guilt by public penance.

Joan of Arc of the Papacy—the Holy See held firm.

Gregory VII triumphs.

In fact, thirty-seven years after his death, Gregory VII triumphed from the depth of his grave. In the Concordat of Worms, in 1122, the Church compelled the State to recognize the right for which she had fought so hard. The State gave back to her the freedom of her canonical elections, from that of the pope down to the elections of all the inferior dignitaries; the Church remained sovereign in her own domain. In mixed questions she made concessions in accordance with her custom.

Free thenceforth to devote herself entirely to the great work of reform, she displayed an energy and an activity without limit. In less than a century, she extinguished Manicheism; she sent all Europe to the Crusades; she drew forth from her bosom three new orders, the first for the ministry of souls (1), the second for the preaching of doctrine (2), the

(1) The Cistercian order is named after its first monastery at Citeaux (Cistercium) in France, where the society was founded in 1098 by St. Robert, under the rule of St. Benedict. St. Bernard was the most celebrated member of the order, and is considered as its second founder. In 1134, after thirty-six years of existence, the order counted seventy monasteries. The Cistersians led a contemplative and very ascetic life.

(2) St. Dominic, born in Spain in 1170, founded the Order of the Friars Preachers or Dominicans, in 1215. At the first general chapter held at Bologna in 1220 it was determined that the habit of the Friars Preachers, theretofore called Black Friars, should be white and that the order should possess no property.
third for the practice of poverty (1). She presided at the birth of communes and universities, she covered with her prestige Gothic art (2) and scholasticism (3), she saw saints ascend the thrones of France (4) and of Cas-

(1) For the practice of poverty St. Francis of Assisi, born in Italy in 1182, founded the Friars Minor or Minorites. Its principal object is the realization of a poverty so perfect that it should be manifested in every way and in all things. The order was formally approved by Honorius III in 1223.

(2) Gothic Art. The word Gothic designates the style of architecture which flourished in the western part of Europe from the end of the twelfth century to the revival of the classical styles in the sixteenth century. Generally speaking, the Gothic style is at once the most scientific and the most artistic style of architecture. It is the most scientific, because its whole strength is made to reside in a finely organized and frankly confessed framework rather than in walls. This framework, made up of piers, arches and buttresses, is freed from every unnecessary incumbrance of wall and it is rendered as light in all its parts as is compatible with strength. It is the most artistic style because the liberal, harmonious and consistent use of the pointed arch, the trefoil, the quatrefoil, the cinquefoil, foliated capitals, deep mouldings, finials, crockets, four-petaled flowers, etc., enable the artist to make our Gothic buildings, pictures of perfect beauty. The Gothic monuments of the Middle Ages are at once the admiration and the despair of modern architects.

(3) Scholasticism. This term denotes the method or system of teaching and the doctrines of "The Schoolmen" or philosophers and theologians of the Middle Ages, especially from the eleventh to the sixteenth centuries. They reduced into unity and system the teachings of the philosophers and theologians who had gone before them. The greatest among them was St. Thomas. He is called the "Angel of the School." Pope Leo XIII. of glorious memory, in his encyclical "Aeterni Patris Filius" urged the Christian world to return to the study of philosophy and theology in accordance with St. Thomas.

(4) The author here alludes to St. Louis, king of France, who undertook two crusades against the Mohammedans and died of fever in 1270, in the course of his second crusade, in his camp near Carthage.
tile (*). And, during two centuries, the twelfth and thirteenth, she became the supreme authority of Western Europe, the oracle of the Christian world.

A turning point in history of Church.

Such were the results of the generous reaction whereby the Catholic Church saved her future. To do this she had to tear herself away from the embrace of feudalism, which desired to make of her a religion of camp chapels and connect her with its fleeting destinies. In comparing the Christian Church as it was at the eve of the conflict with what it has been since, one can realize the bearing of this great phenomenon and understand that there is no exaggeration in seeing in this salutary crisis one of the turning points of the history of civilization.

(*) St. Ferdinand III (1219-1252) conquered the greater part of Andalusia, leaving the Mohammedans only the kingdom of Granada. The cathedral of Burgos occupies the first place among the monuments of his greatness.
The Church and Neo-Caesarism (*)

The Church emerged victorious from the conflict of the Investitures. Being now free from the abuses which had dishonored her she attained unwonted prestige. The Papacy was like the sun at its zenith: supreme arbiter of the moral and religious life of the peoples; there was no social interest which was foreign to Rome.

The Church at its zenith.

How did the Church use her influence? She had a twofold aim: to pacify Europe and to turn her united forces against Islam. The Popes pursued this sublime ideal with magnificent courage and abnegation. Peace among the Christian peoples was their constant care, just as peace among the individuals had been the special concern of the bishops who, in the tenth and the eleventh centuries, succeeded in establishing the Truce (*) Neo-Caesarism means new Caesarism. Caesarism is derived from the word Caesar, the Roman general and dictator (B. C. 100-44) and designates a system of government in which unrestricted power is exercised by a single person. "Kaiserism" is the modern and shorter term for Neo-Caesarism.

of God (1). It was also a truce of God of which the Papacy dreamed—no longer a truce between individuals, but a truce between nations. The Papacy desired this truce, in the first place, for the thing itself, since human civilization has no higher aim than peace. She desired it, in the second place, that she might oppose a compact and united Europe against the eternal enemy—the Crescent (2). And note well, this dream of the Popes of the Middle Ages has remained the inheritance of generous minds, from Joan of Arc and Christopher Columbus down to Leibnitz and Cardinal Lavigerie. And we may hope that it will also be the ideal of Europe, when a re-Christianized Europe will have become reconciled with the ideal.

The splendor of the social role of the Papacy at this epoch found majestic expression

(1) The Truce of God was a temporary suspension of hostilities. It was brought into existence to curb the war lust of the feudal lords. A Council of Elne in 1207, in a canon concerning the sanctification of Sunday, forebade hostilities from Saturday night until Monday morning. This prohibition was subsequently extended to the days of the week consecrated by the great mysteries of Christianity, namely, Thursday in memory of the Ascension, Friday, the day of the Passion—Still another step included Advent and Lent in the Truce. The penalty for the violation of the Truce was excommunication. The Truce soon spread from France to Germany and Italy. The ecumenical council of 1179 extended the institution to the whole Church.

(2) The Crescent, or sign of the increasing moon, was the ancient symbol of Byzantium or Constantinople. After the taking of that city by the Turks in 1453, it became the emblem of the Turkish Empire and the sign and symbol of the Mohammedan religion, just as the Cross is the emblem of the Christian religion.
during the festivities of the First Jubilee, which was celebrated in Rome, in 1300, whilst Boniface VIII occupied the chair of Peter. During the course of that year, the Pope, from the windows of his palace, saw the Christian world pass before him, going to the tombs of the Apostles in order to gain the indulgences of the Jubilee. The Eternal City then presented an incredible spectacle:—there were never fewer than two hundred thousand visitors, a truly astounding number if we consider the primitive modes of travel of those days. An eyewitness has described for us, in immortal verse, these vast throngs crossing the bridge of St. Angelo on their way to and from the Vatican; those going held the right, those coming back the left, as is done at the present day on the bridges of the large German cities. And painting, as well as poetry, has immortalized this spectacle, for one of the most ancient paintings of Giotto—which may be seen to the present day in the Church of St. John Lateran—is his Boniface VIII proclaiming the Jubilee from the loggia of that sanctuary. Certainly in this year of boundless enthusiasm, when the Pope almost seemed to be more than a mere man and saw the whole of mankind at his feet, he needed an act of profound humility to resist the suggestions of such high fortune; more than once he had need to recall the words pronounced on the day of his coronation whilst they burned the tow at the foot of the Pontifical throne: "Holy Father, thus passeth the glory of this world."

Rule of Christian society wrested from Pope by Lay State.

And indeed, thus passed the glory of this world for Boniface VIII. Before his death, this old man, at the age of seventy-seven, had to assist at the catastrophe which threatened to engulf the incomparable destinies of the Papacy. Two years after the triumph of the great Jubilee, the mercenaries of the Most Christian King seized the Vicar of Christ in his own palace, and the nation which called herself the eldest daughter of the Church attempted to crush the Roman See. The Pope, when on the brink of the grave, overwhelmed with sorrow and humiliation, knew that a dreadful revolution was consummated, or at least that its principle had been triumphantly affirmed, and that, for centuries to come, the rule of human society had been wrested from the Vicar of Jesus Christ (*).

Who then was the mysterious and terrible enemy that was about to upset Christian Europe, paralyze the action of the Papacy and change the course of civilization? It was the Lay State, a new and conquering power which preceding centuries had not known. It rose suddenly, like a giant, to face the Papacy and provoke it to mortal combat. Armed from the beginning with a theory from which it deduced its omnipotence, this Lay State claimed the adherence of its followers with the authority of an unquestionable dogma, though in reality it had no other principle than force; it began against the Church of Christ the long drawn out combat which has not yet neared its end, and whose fluctuating fortunes remained for our descendants the most solemn problem of history.

(*) The author refers here to Philip the Fair, king of France, sending William of Nogaret to Anagni in order to seize Pope Boniface VIII.

Limited authority of kings becomes absolute.

This gives me occasion once more to recall that it is ideas which rule the world. It is in the incorporeal region of the mind that are worked out those irresistible forces which destroy or build up:—just as yonder, on the silent and solitary summits of the Alps, are formed the streams which flow down to the valleys, to bring them life, when their course is tranquil, but to work devastation, when swollen by the storms.

Let us, in turn, go up to the summits, to discover how, in the region of ideas, there was worked out the political doctrine which was about to fall like an avalanche on this growing society. At first sight, this theory seems opposed to the spirit of the Middle Ages.
To the men of this epoch, the king was without doubt the head of society, and religion invested him with a sacred and inviolable character. But his authority was far from being unlimited; everywhere—in the stronghold of the nobleman, in the walled enclosure of the communes, under the vaults of the churches and monasteries, on the lofty throne of St. Peter—it met free forces which acted as a counterpoise and did not permit the king to exceed the limits established by religion and by custom. The king of the Middle Ages was what would to-day be termed a constitutional king, not that there always existed written documents which formally limited his power, but because the privileges of the various classes of society were, in effect, a limit which he might not overstep, if he did not wish to hear the voice of public anger grumbling about his throne.

If this was the case, how could the idea of royal absolutism, at a given moment, take hold of the minds of men and finally triumph to such a point that it eliminated from modern politics the influence of the Church and of its Head? The question is very complex; I will endeavor, nevertheless, to answer it with clearness and precision.

Royal absolutism due to ultra-nationalism and adoption of Roman law.

Manifestly, there is among modern peoples—to some extent among all peoples—an invincible repugnance to international governments. Each nation seeks within itself the sovereignty principle of its activity; it obeys with pleasure only the authorities which have emanated from its bosom; it is tempted to regard as a stranger a master living at too great a distance. If by their sacred character, by the necessary universality which is part of dogma itself, the religious institutions escape this centrifugal tendency, this is not true of political institutions which nations will not support except on condition that they have them under full control. This explains the dismemberment of the empire of Charlemagne, which was regretted by only a few cultured minds. We may thus understand why for centuries Italy opposed the authority of its emperors. These national tendencies, however little they were excited, became passions, and when aroused by an interested power, these passions knew no bounds. "The Pope or the King, which is to be the ruler of the kingdom of France?" The query, thus put, could receive but one answer, and the best Christians, questioned in this way, sided spontaneously with the king and espoused his cause against the Chief of Christendom, for the defense of the national liberties. To this influence of national self-love, whose power it would be difficult to exaggerate, there was added another force which was not less powerful. At this time all intellectual and scientific superiority was not confined to the ranks of the clergy. A lay society had come into existence and had developed; it had its superior minds, its scientists, its jurists, its statesmen; it was conscious of its power and of its dignity; it took its place alongside of the ecclesiastical order, it had no intention of leaving to the latter the exclusive direction of minds, and already it had taken a prominent part in politics and legislation.

Thus nationalism, on the one part, laicism, on the other part, without being hostile in principle to the Church, had nevertheless a different ideal and pursued a course which was easily set against the aims of the Church. But this opposition, in order to become conscious and intense, needed to be stirred up by some resolute agent; this agent was at hand. We shall see him at work.

The Middle Ages had at all times a strong predilection for the study of antiquity. They put all the more ardor into the study because antiquity was, at this epoch, almost the only object of scientific knowledge. This study gave them an opportunity of knowing another society, a civilization different from theirs. This society appeared to them through the radiant prism of its masterpieces, with the magical colors of a better world. Thus the poets and philosophers of antiquity enjoyed, during the Middle Ages, an authority second only to that of the Gospel. Aristotle (1) was the fetish of the school, the master of those who know, and when his authority had been invoked—Magister dixit—the last word had been spoken. As to Virgil—it did not suffice to honor him as the prince of poets; he had become a marvelous personage, half magician, half prophet. Sometimes, this infatuation literally turned the heads of people, as happened in the case of that poor monk of the tenth century who, six hundred years before Don Quixote, took for realities the fictions of Virgil (2) and taught that the only true religion was that of the Aeneid!

Nowhere did this fetishism for antiquity manifest itself in more extravagant ways and nowhere did it produce more disastrous results than among the men given to the study of law, the jurists, as they were called. I shall confine myself to just one example of this intellectual malady. In accordance with the chroniclers, a manuscript of the Pandects

(1) Aristotle (384-322 B.C.) Greek philosopher, a pupil of Plato, teacher of Alexander the Great, is considered the greatest heathen philosopher. He wrote the first systematic treatise on logic. He wrote also treatises on metaphysics, physics, biology, zoology, psychology, anthropology, ethics, politics, poetry and rhetoric.

(2) Virgil, (70-19 B.C.) a famous Roman poet. His "Aeneid" is the greatest of Latin epics.
(* ) preserved at Florence was venerated as a relic. People came on pilgrimage to see it. and two men, each holding a lighted candle in hand, stood, one to the right, the other to the left of the show-window where the much revered conjuring book received the homage of its devotees. This is sheer burlesque. A more serious phase of it is that from the eleventh century, the first law school in Europe, that of Bologna, propagated in the Occident the cult of Corpus Juris Civilis and refused thenceforth to recognize any other source of jurisprudence. The national law of the modern peoples was despised and derided by the jurists who prided themselves on their acquaintance with the masterpiece of Justinian, and thus it fell more and more into disuse. Meanwhile the Roman law began its triumphant course which was to end in the conquest of all Christendom. This infatuation for the Roman law may be explained partly by the incontestable superiority, which, under some aspects, it had over the Germanic law of the Middle Ages. The latter, born of ancient Barbarian customs, preserved the stamp of the rudimentary society of which it was the expression. Written in

(*) By "Pandects" is meant the digest, or abridgment, in fifty books, of the decisions, writings and opinions of the old Roman jurists, made in the sixth century by direction of the Emperor Justinian, and forming the leading compilation of the Roman civil law. It is also called "Corpus Juris" (body of the law.)
crude language, it was almost exclusively penal and left unsolved most of the complex problems which result from the social relations of civilized men. It was devoid of all prestige in the eyes of the learned, it lacked the authority which comes from association with the name of a great jurist, it resembled one of these close fitting and curtailed garments which may suit a child but impede the gait of the adult. The Roman law, on the contrary, evolved during centuries by generations of learned men, appeared as a great monument, firm of foundation and indestructible in workmanship. It had the amplitude, the richness, the scientific precision worthy of a great civilization. In it all was foreseen, analyzed and judged by a luminous and profound intelligence which seemed to have penetrated the entire social life and which had acquired some sort of universality and infallibility. The Roman people, pre-eminently a juridical people, have produced nothing greater than the Roman law; and if one wishes to form an idea of the Roman people in the work which best represents their genius, one must study them in their legislative work. It is not astonishing, therefore, that the minds of men in the Middle Ages should have been dazzled at this aspect of the Roman law—much the same as the travelers of that period, who came from the northern cities before the erection of our great cathedrals, were wont to stop overawed at the sight of the Column of Trajan, the Coliseum, or the Baths of Caracalla. And as there is but a step from admiration to imitation, it is no wonder that the Middle Ages took the step and dreamed of making the Corpus Juris Civilis the code of the civilized world at that time.

Roman law fosters unbridled absolutism or Caesarism.

Here began the deplorable and tragical error. While from a scientific point of view, the Roman law was incontestably superior to the laws of the Middle Ages; while, with regard to civil relations, it displayed a perfection which the barbarian codes could not approach; on the other hand, from a political point of view, it enshrined a system from which, it seems, the minds of the free men of the Middle Ages should have turned away with horror. The most unbridled absolutism was proclaimed as a doctrine with unprecedented boldness and logic. According to the Roman law, the sovereign, that is, the emperor, was a veritable god. Not that the Roman sceptics and the unbelievers of the Empire imagined that he really possessed a divine nature—they knew the contrary but too well—but they conceded that he possessed over his subjects the same power that God Himself has over His creatures. The will of the emperor took the place of justice and law, or, to express it better, his will was law. And though that will was ordinarily but a cruel and depraved caprice, as in the case of such tyrants as Caligula (1), Nero (2), Domitian (3), Commodus (4), Caracalla (5), Heliogabulus

(1) Caligula, Roman Emperor, (37-41), sent cups of poison to his friends, ordered superannuated or sick gladiators, speculators or prisoners to be thrown to the wild beasts in the arena. When his terrible cruelties drove th people away from the amphitheatre, he closed the public granaries. One day, to express his displeasure at the applause in the circus, he exclaimed: "Would that Roman people had but one head, that I might cut it off with one stroke." He was shamelessly immoral.

(2) Nero, Roman Emperor, (54-68), procured the assassination of his own mother, sang verses and accompanied himself on the lyre, whilst watching the conflagration of Rome. When he was accused of having caused the fire he blamed it on the Christians. He ordered the first general persecution against them. Deserted by the people, abandoned even by the pretorians he ordered his grave to be dug; and gazing into it he exclaimed: "How great an artist is about to perish!" Finding no one who was willing to kill him, he stabbed himself.

(3) Domitian, Roman Emperor (81-96), the equal of any of his predecessors in obscenity, exceeded both Nero and Tiberius in cruelty; but, nevertheless, the Romans called him god, the son of Minerva. Pliny informs us that the streets leading to the Capitol were always bloody with the sacrifices of human victims before his statues. The career of this monster was cut short by his wife who induced one of his freedmen to kill him because he intended to proscribe her. Domitian decreed the second general persecution against the Christians.

(4) Commodus, Roman emperor (180-192), devoted much of his time to fighting and killing, in the public arena, opponents whose weapons were always blunt and edgeless, or cripples disguised as wild beasts. Such exhibitions regaled the frequenter of the Circus on seven hundred thirty-five occasions. After a reign of nearly thirteen years the wretch was poisoned by his closest attendants who had learnt he had ordered their death.

(5) Caracalla, Roman Emperor (211-217), committed excesses which defy description. In Rome alone, more than twenty thousand persons were executed under the pretext that they were partisans of Geta, brother of Caracalla, whom the latter had treacherously killed in his mother's arms. Caracalla was assassinated in his thirtieth year by Macrinus, prefect of the pretorians.
(*), etc., the people bowed before it without resistance and without murmur, and from the depths of their agony greeted the master with the salutation of the dying gladiator. The pagan world could think of no other form of sovereign power, of no other manner of obeying it.

It is worth noting that the jurists of the Middle Ages, hypnotized by their Corpus, did not recoil before the monstrous theory of power so radically opposed to the Christian principles and to the Germanic traditions. Convinced of the ideal perfection of the Roman law, they did not see, or were not willing to see, that undeniable defect of the masterpiece. Apparently they regarded imperial absolutism, as the condition and the guarantee of the perfection of the Roman law. Doubtless they persuaded themselves that the authority of the sovereign should be unlimited in order to insure the full enforcement of the law. Thus they accepted in its entirety the judicial inheritance of the Roman Empire; and Caesarism—which is the name given in history to the Roman theory of absolute power—became the first article of their political creed.

(*) Heliogabalus, an oriental adventurer, a priest of the Sun, (whence his name, Heliogabalus), became Roman emperor through the intrigues of his mother , (218-222). During the four years of rule his barbarity, immorality, and extravagances exceeded those of any who had yet wielded the Roman scepter. Among his ridiculous enactments we note his enrollment of his grandmother among the Conscript Fathers. Heliogabalus was killed by the pretorians.

Nor is it surprising that men born in a free society should become the apologists of absolutism and dream of bringing mankind back to slavery. Similar aberrations are not uncommon; the plea of system explains them without justifying them. Moreover, men very seldom perceive the consequences of the principles they admit; and many would shudder at the practical application of principles which they have advocated with the greatest ardor. This is a natural infirmity of the human mind, which it may be humiliating to admit, but which it would be puerile to deny.

Kings of Germany strive to apply Caesarism.

When the jurists had sufficiently spread and developed their principles; there appeared sovereigns who were willing to apply them. They were the kings of Germany of the House of Suabia. The Hohenstaufen—a name derived from their paternal castle—had, moreover, great qualities of mind and, being possessed of boundless ambition, they became the ardent advocates of these doctrines whenever their thirst for power could profit by them. They were the first to put themselves forward as the legitimate and direct successors of the ancient Roman Emperors, in order that they might thus lay claim to all the power possessed by their assumed predecessors. Docile pupils of the jurists, they found in their teachings inspiration for their political conduct and they endeavored to put their maxims into practice.

But the world of the Middle Ages was not yet ripe for slavery. The Papacy protested, the communes arose in opposition, a portion of feudalism itself refused to exchange a suzerain for a master. Emperor Frederic Barbarossa, in striving to impose on Italy laws dictated by the unmitigated spirit of Caesarism, encountered the stubborn resistance of the Lombard cities. In 1176, he was conquered by these at the celebrated battle of Legnano and compelled to recognize solemnly the rights he had trampled underfoot. His grandson, Frederick II, renewed the attempt in the thirteenth century; but, defeated in turn and excommunicated by the Pope, he was completely overthrown, and died in time to escape witnessing the fall and extermination of his whole dynasty.

Thus, on two successive occasions, the jurists were the losers of the game. On two successive occasions the Catholic spirit triumphed over the theories of Caesarism; and, on the ruins of an empire which the emperors themselves had destroyed by their ambition, the Catholic spirit kept intact the great principle of the Christian republic of the Middle Ages. Europe remained a moral and religious unit under the international magistracy of peace intrusted to the Pope, who was the protector of right and the guardian of public liberties.

But, although in these two conflicts the nations had risen against the new idea, the idea was not dead:—battles do not kill ideas. The principles of Caesarism continued to spread among the jurists, and their number increased in a growing society which had more and more need of them. Thus simultaneously in all Europe there arose a caste of guiding minds who were imbued with a system of public law, anti-Christian in its essence, although often its adherents were themselves not conscious of its anti-Christian character. And the day came, half a century after their second defeat, when the jurists at last had their revenge.

Philip the Fair struggles for absolutism against Boniface VIII.

It was in France that they found their opportunity, and it was King Philip the Fair who gave it to them. Grandson of Louis IX, enjoying the prestige which the saintly king had reflected upon his crown and dynasty, himself one of the most tenacious and most imperious characters known in history, Philip the Fair had great power for either good or evil. But unfortunately he was surrounded by a group of jurists such as Enguerrand of Marigny, Peter Flotte, William of Plaisians
William of Nogaret, whose society formed, in a way, his intellectual atmosphere. They imbued his mind with the new doctrine, and he emerged with the cold fanaticism of a despot, incapable of being stayed by a moral consideration and ready to sacrifice the whole universe to his ambition.

This man was to open a new phase of modern history. Indeed, his struggle against the Papacy is not merely an episode of the history of the Middle Ages, it is another turning point of universal history. Let us pause to consider the full importance of the struggle about to ensue.

When Pope Boniface VIII ascended the Pontifical throne (1294), sad events desolated Christendom. St. John of Acre, the last city held by the Christians in the Holy Land, had just been re-conquered by the Mohammedans. Thus all Palestine had fallen into their hands, and the blood shed in its defense by two million Christians had flown in vain during two centuries! It was a bitter sorrow for the Papacy, and Boniface VIII, in donning what Dante calls the weight of the great mantle, felt the sorrow in all its bitterness. His dream was to remedy this terrible situation by re-establishing peace among all the Christian princes and by obtaining from them a new expedition to the Holy Land. To bring this about it was absolutely necessary to prevent the war which seemed imminent between the King of France, Philip the Fair, and the King of England, Edward the First. This wicked war threatened to kindle a conflagration throughout all Europe. The two opponents secured allies on all sides: Philip counted on Scotland, Edward on the Empire, on Flanders, on Brabant. But, at this moment, true to the duty of his office, the Pope intervened to recall to sentiments of humanity those furious fools who, under the most futile pretexts, were preparing to deluge the world with blood. He spoke to them in words at once noble, firm, affectionate and hopeful, such as one would expect from the Chief of Christendom. "Are these," he said in substance, "exploits worthy of you and of your ancestors, and is it in this way that you fulfill your obligation of hastening to the assistance of the Christians of the Holy Land "? Giving in to the entreaties of the Pope and perhaps also to the voice of their Christian conscience, the two rivals agreed to sign a truce of one year, which was to expire on June 24, 1296. It was an achievement full of promise for the cause of civilization, and so the Pope must have judged it, for, on April 13, 1296, of his own authority, he renewed the truce for a period of two years, and declared it obligatory under pain of excommunication. However, in order to spare the self-love of the two kings and perhaps also because he had counted on their own spontaneous act, he had enjoined his legates to promulgate this truce only if the kings themselves did not take the initiative.

* Letter of May 28, 1295 in the Register of Boniface VIII., col. 295.

Then was heard the voice of the King of France, striking, for the first time, a discordant note in the harmony of the social doctrine of the Middle Ages. Philip the Fair protested against the bull of the Pope; he refused even to listen to the reading of it before making the following declarations: "That the temporal government of his kingdom belonged to him alone; that in this matter he recognized no superior; that in this regard he would never submit to any living soul; that he wished to exercise his jurisdiction in his fiefs, defend his kingdom and pursue his right with the aid of his subjects, of his allies and of God; that the truce did not bind him. In matters spiritual, following the example of his predecessors, he was disposed to receive humbly the admonitions of the Holy See, like a true son of the Church."

He added that he accepted the mediation of the Pope, in the capacity of a private person and as a chosen arbiter, but in no way in the capacity of a recognized authority.

* Letters of the 16th and 17th of April 1296, in the Register of Boniface VIII, col. 59, et seq.
Declarations of Philip imply separation of politics and Christian morality.

Bear in mind the declarations of Philip the Fair; they have a wide bearing and go far beyond the question which provoked them. To deny to the Pope the right of intervening between belligerent kings in order to impose peace upon them meant more than the weakening of the most glorious and the most beneficent prerogative of the Holy See, more than the destruction of the only obstacle which prevented ambitious criminals from upsetting the world and deluging it with blood. However disastrous from this point of view were the declarations of the King of France for the future of European civilization, they were still more baneful because of the principle which inspired them. For the first time since the beginning of Christianity, they proclaimed the separation of politics and morality. The contrary had been recognized up to that time, and the kings themselves had admitted that their governments should conform to the moral law of Christianity. Philip the Fair denied this implicitly, since he was not willing that the will of the sovereign should be bound in the name of the law. This was tantamount to declaring that the royal power knew no limit, and, as a matter of fact, it no longer would have any other limits than those of its own choosing. It is the pagan theory in all its nakedness: the prince is above the law; his will is the law. As the king wills, so wills the law. And during five centuries it continued to be the axiom that inspired all governments.

It is well to note the origin of royal absolutism in Europe. We are at the antipodes of the Christian theory of power. The principles formulated by Philip the Fair were those which the Popes opposed and defeated in their twofold struggle against the Hohenstaufen; they were those which henceforth would be invoked whenever there was question of humiliating and belittling the Holy See, or whenever, despite the resistance of the Holy See, there was question of encroaching in one point or another upon the patrimony of Christian public right bequeathed the nations by former ages. And it is worthy of remark that a great number of historians, followed by a veritable mob of second-rate minds, persuade themselves with a naïveté almost ludicrous, that these theories of royal absolutism are Catholic theories. This is repeated to us every day in the polemics of the press, and I do not know what is more to be wondered at in the success of so bold a lie: the credulity of those who believe it or the audacity of those who circulate it.

Forbearance of Boniface VIII.

How did Pope Boniface VIII treat the declaration of the King of France, which accentuated with unrestrained crudity the violent opposition of the new politics to Catholic tradition? They who know this Pontiff only through the traditional lies of the State historiography, have a ready answer: "He protested, he manifested his indignation, he hurled the thunders of excommunication upon the head of the bold king of France." Not at all! Boniface VIII took the insult, let pass without protest the sophistries of the new politics, consented even to accept arbitration under the humiliating conditions imposed by the King of France: namely, not in the capacity of an authority and in the quality of Sovereign Pontiff, but in the role of a private person and—these are the exact words—"as Benedict Cajetan." * Why such condescension and forbearance? Apparently because, for the Pope, all other considerations gave way to the interest of public peace, even those considerations which concerned the dignity of the Holy See itself. Indeed, the Holy See, with an abnegation and a zeal which never failed for a single instant, devoted itself whole and entire to the great task of reconciling France and England. Notice, for example, how the Holy See addressed the German Emperor Adolph of Nassau, one of the enemies of Philip the Fair, in order to prevent him from taking up arms:

* This is the name of Boniface VIII previous to his elevation to the supreme Pontificate.
"We have passed sleepless nights, assuming voluntarily the burden, in order to be able to establish peaceful relations between you and our sons in Christ, the illustrious kings, Philip of France and Edward of England, and to secure tranquility to the Christian people, for the purpose of preventing the chiefs of the faithful and their subjects from turning against one another the swords which must be drawn in defense of the Holy Land and against the enemies of the Cross of Jesus Christ. And for this reason we warn you, we pray you, we exhort you earnestly and we entreat you, by the blood shed by Jesus Christ, not to attack the said King of France or his kingdom; but rather may your royal soul yield to our entreaties and be disposed to peace or at the very least to a long and sufficient truce, during which it will be possible to treat effectively of peace in our presence, through the envoys of the various parties."

At last, on June 27, 1298, Boniface VIII could render his sentence. It bore evidence of the purest equity, and certainly, as even French historians admit, it was not the King of France who had reason to complain. Indeed, the sentence approved the marriage of his daughter Isabella with the Prince of Wales, and through this union sacrificed the interests of the Count of Flanders, Guy of Dampierre, who had engaged in turn his two daughters to this prince and who saw them successively abandoned. But, as I have said already, in the eyes of the Pope, the cause of European peace led all other considerations. Finally, at the cost of many tribulations, he had obtained the result so ardently longed for, even though at the last moment the one who gained most from peace pretended that he hesitated to accept arbitration, as being too much to his disadvantage.

Characteristics of first encounter between Pope and King.

This was the first encounter between the Papacy and the new politics. I had to explain it in some detail, both because it is little known, and because it perfectly characterizes the attitudes of the two parties in the course of the long conflict which was about to open. The Papacy, as international magistracy and guardian of the general interests of Christendom, undertook to safeguard peace between the nations, and in order to attain this great result, made all sacrifices and concessions compatible with its high dignity. The King of France had no such concern. His only preoccupation was to establish his absolutism in spite of the sovereign Pontiff as well as of his own subjects, and without any regard for the general welfare of civilization. What concerned the Pope was the peace of the world; what concerned the King was his unlimited power. We should add—for it is of importance—that in this struggle the Pope represented the Catholic tradition of Europe, the King the revolutionary aspirations of the jurists. We note this opposition, however evident, because the hired forgers have here reversed the roles. In their version it was the Pope who innovated and it was the king who defended himself.

Philip the Fair attacks immunities of the Church.

The rest of the conflict between Boniface VIII and Philip the Fair presents the same characteristics as this first episode. The matter of ecclesiastical immunities, which broke out shortly afterwards, again brought in opposition the Papacy, which defended the traditional public right of Christian Europe, and the King, who sought to enthrone the revolutionary maxims of pagan rights. Philip was always in need of money, and his jurists had taught him that the possessions of his subjects belonged to him. Accordingly, he took whatever he could lay hands on. He took the possessions of the Knights Templars, he took the possessions of the Jews, he took the possessions of all the taxpayers by coining false money—it was natural that he should also wish to take the possessions of the Church.

But the possessions of the Church were protected by special immunities. In accordance with the doctrine of the time, they belonged to the poor and they could not be taxed. This did not mean, as some have asserted with inconceivable ignorance, that the Church did not contribute to the public expenses. Far from it! Only, it contributed in the form of voluntary donations, by giving over to the king, when he was in need of it, one tenth of its entire revenue. This was called the tithes. It has been calculated that in a little more than half a century, from 1247 to 1300, the French clergy paid to the king thirty-nine tithes, almost four times its entire revenue, or one-fifth of all its possessions. These figures attest that the exemption from taxation was for the Church a purely honorary privilege and that the patriotism of the clergy neutralized its immunities. Their voluntary donations were more burdensome than an obligatory tax would have been.

When, in 1295, the clergy were asked to pay a new tithe, they protested and, upon repeated and persistent demands, appealed to the Pope. The Pope was the guardian of the privileges of the entire Church and the protector of all her rights; when called upon by the clergy of France, he was strictly bound, under pain of failing in his most sacred obligations, to come to the rescue of the oppressed, and he did. I shall not relate the varying fortunes of this new conflict with the crown. It will suffice to state that here again the Pope showed the greatest forbearance towards the prevaricating King. The Pope recalled to the mind of the King, as was his duty, that he had no right to impose taxes upon the clergy without the consent of the Pope, but he assured the King that he would never refuse his consent whenever there would be question of the defense of the kingdom and that he would sell the sacred treasures rather than endanger so great a cause. He added that in case of urgent and very evident necessity, he would even permit that they should proceed without awaiting his consent, but that, in all other cases, they should submit to the law. One must admit that this was pushing the spirit of conciliation as far as justice permitted, and, thanks to the moderation of both, the conflict was once more avoided.

Philip attacks Pope's ambassador.

But peace was to be short-lived. Contempt of law was always the characteristic trait of Philip the Fair; he did not seem to enjoy the fulness of the royal prerogative so long as he encountered any limits to his power. One day the Pope sent a messenger to ask for the release of the unfortunate Count of Flanders, Guy of Dampierre, who was languishing in the prisons of the King. The ambassador, who was entrusted with a message so worthy of the Father of the faithful, was Bernard Saisset, Bishop of Pamiers. What took place in the interview between the King and the Bishop? We do not know, but the King pretended that the ambassador had used language that was not respectful, and he pursued the unfortunate prelate with incredible rancor. He demanded that the Pope should take from him his episcopal charter and even the privilege of clerical immunity (*), in order that he himself might afterwards impeach him before a lay tribunal and have him condemned as a State criminal. This demand was a veritable mockery. One might say that the King was jesting in exacting of the Pope, at one and the same time, the violation of all the most sacred rights: the respect due to a bishop, the lawful immunity of the priest, the sacred character of the ambassador, not to speak of the ignominy in imposing upon the Pope such odious measures against his legate whose only crime was that he had served his master!

The Pope replied with calm dignity and fortitude; he called up the cause of Bernard Saisset at this own tribunal, and he took steps to convene a council in Rome to adopt measures to meet the situation. At the same time he addressed the tyrant himself in the bull Auscultata fili, where he set forth his grievances. The tone of the document is disclosed by its very title (Listen, my son). To these legitimate measures, the King, prompted by his jurists, replied with unheard-of violence and deceit. He convened the States-General of France, and read to them a false papal bull which had been made up by his men of law, in which they put haughty and scornful language into the mouth of the Sovereign Pontiff, ordered a jurist to read a reply to the Pope which was a tissue of revolting calumnies, and, as a result of these infamous maneuvers, he obtained from the deceived and terrorized States-General a bill of indemnity for his conduct towards the Pope.

(*) Clerical Immunity, as recognized by the Christian States in the Middle Ages, withdrew the clergy from secular jurisdiction, so that not only spiritual lawsuits of clerics, but also temporal lawsuits, whether criminal or civil, fell exclusively within the jurisdiction of ecclesiastical judges.

Philip causes arrest of Pope.

This time the cup of patience was full to overflowing. The Pope fulminated the bull Unam Sanctam, a solemn and moderate exposition of the pure Catholic doctrine on the relations between the two powers, in accordance with the tradition of the Church, such as might have been formulated by Gregory VII, Alexander III (1) or Innocent III (2). At the same time, he prepared the excommunication of the prevaricating King. Then Philip the Fair decided to make his final stroke. Surpassing all his past crimes, he dispatched to Italy one of the vilest insulters of the Pope, William of Nogaret, with the mission to instigate a plot against the Holy See. The wretch, after having endeavored to shake the fidelity of the Roman people, set out for Anagni with the intention of surprising the old man in his little town. Boniface was without defense. He donned his pontifical insignia, and, holding in his hand the keys of St. Peter, awaited his enemies. Neither this grandeur of soul, nor the majesty of the Vicar of Jesus Christ, nor the white hair of a man of eighty-six years, moved the criminals. The Pope remained in their power for three days; the third day the inhabitants of Anagni rose in opposition and drove them out. Boniface did not wish that they should be pursued, but so many emotions had broken his strength and a few days afterwards he expired.

(1) Alexander III, Pope, (1159-81), foremost as a canonist, and ecclesiastical legislator and a valiant defender of the rights of the Church against the encroachments of kings and emperors; he overcame the violence of the Emperor Barbarossa and compelled Henry II of England to ask pardon for the murder of Thomas Becket.

(2) Innocent III, one of the greatest popes of the Middle Ages (1161-1216) was a learned theologian and one of the greatest jurists of his time and a strenuous defender of the rights of the Church. He steadily strove to put an end to hostilities among Christian princes. He prepared a crusade against the Moors. He undertook the Fourth Crusade. He extended his beneficent influence practically over the whole Christian world.

Great was the indignation of the Christian world on hearing of the attempt made at Anagni. Dante, despite his supposed grievance against the venerable Pope, has forever branded the contemptible authors of the dastardly assault in these immortal verses: "I see the fleurs de lis enter Anagni, I see the Christ imprisoned in His Vicar, I see Him again given over to derision, I see Him again drenched with vinegar and gall, and crucified between new thieves. *

Philip attacks memory of Boniface.

This judgment of the greatest poet of the Middle Ages is also the honest judgment of humanity, and the cowardly courtiers of royal absolutism were not unaware of it; accordingly, following the example of the royal malefactor, they worked with boundless fury and cynicism to pervert the opinion of posterity. After having outraged their victim, they wished to disgrace him; after having grieved him to death, they attempted to dishonor his name. It would be difficult to form an idea of the intense rancor with which Philip the Fair strove to bring into contempt the memory of Boniface VIII with his successors: he was foiled in his attempt, but the diversion was cleverly made to turn attention away from his own crimes and, in this at least, he succeeded. As to the official historiographers, especially such as Dupuy, Baillet and others, they continued the tradition bequeathed them by the jurists of Philip the Fair. They fabricated some documents; they falsified others; when they could neither destroy nor alter, they at least changed the dates, to modify their bearing and often to make them express a contrary meaning; in a word, they have heaped upon the memory of Boniface VIII such a load of lies and calumnies, that after five centuries we have not yet succeeded in clearing entirely the field of history.

* Dante, Purgatorio, XX. 86-90.

Modern French historians exonerate Boniface.

Nevertheless the hour of justice has struck. Now that royal absolutism, defeated in turn, no longer has at its service the corrupt pens of its flatterers, the French historians themselves to-day admit to what extent their kings made travesty of truth at a time when it was to their profit to disfigure it. They admit, too, that, in this resounding drama, the aggression came not from the Papacy, which was content with defending its traditional position, but from the royal power, which, armed with the theories of Caesarism, sought the overthrow of a political regime which was based on the religious unity of the world and on the indirect power of the Sovereign Pontiffs. "Boniface VIII," writes Mr. Boutaric in a celebrated book, "did not bring new pretensions to the See of Peter: his politics towards outside princes were those of his predecessors *". But no one will contend that the politics of Philip the Fair were those of St. Louis: they were, at the most, those of Frederick of Suabia, and these, in last analysis, were the politics of the Roman Caesars. In other words, they were pagan politics, making a fresh effort to take the guidance of these modern states away from Christian principles.

* E. Boutaric, La France sous Philippe le Bel, p. 94.

I have already stated that these politics have triumphed and I have indicated, in the beginning of this lecture, what connivances they found at an early hour in the social body. In conclusion I wish to indicate briefly the results of their victory.

Evil results of neo-Caesarism.

It was, first of all, the destruction of what has been called the Christian Republic of the Middle Ages. Up to then Europe was strongly united not only by the identity of religious beliefs but also by the identity of political maxims. It connected public right with Christian morality, and recognized as the interpreter of the latter the Vicar of Jesus Christ. From the time of Philip the Fair it was so no more. There was no longer a Christian Republic, as was evidenced by the disappearance of what was its wonderful manifestation—the Crusades. St. Louis had been the last of the Christian kings, he was also the last of the Crusaders. And Europe, which up to that time had carried the standard of the Cross to Jerusalem, to Tunis, to Damascus, recoiled before the Crescent. They had to give back Jerusalem and hand over Constantinople to Islam. Mohammed became again the arbiter of the Mediterranean and the Turks the terror of the world. We can blame neo-Caesarism for plunging the most beautiful lands of the earth into barbarism. Behold, from an international point of view, the balance sheet of royal absolutism!

From a national point of view the absolutism of kings has broken the equilibrium of the social body, concentrated all the life in the head, atrophied free institutions and made revolution the only possible corrective of tyranny. Nor is that all. The Christian nations wrenched from the guidance of the Church have not found their way; they seem condemned to travel the whole cycle of error before finding their way again. Ever and anon they turn to new systems which become bankrupt one after another. Philosophism, liberalism, socialism, anarchism, to say nothing of the intermediate doctrines, are the legitimate heirs of royal absolutism; like it, they will betray their promises. The unrest will last as long as the destiny of the Christian nations remains in the hands of a political system which does not worry about Christian principles. The Catholic Church, seated at the foot of the Cross, waits calmly for the day when revolution shall have finished the education of mankind. (*)

* At this point it is refreshing to note how Pope Benedict XV, from the day of his coronation, did not cease to entreat the belligerent nations to make a just and durable peace, how, in particular, on August 1, 1917, in a letter addressed to the leaders of all the belligerent peoples, compelled by a sentiment of his supreme duty as the common father of the faithful, in the name of the Divine Redeemer, the Prince of Peace, he admonished them to reflect on their very grave responsibility before God and before man, begged them to substitute for the material force of arms the moral force of right, to adopt compulsory arbitration of all national questions in order to reach a just and durable peace.

In harmony with the above President Wilson in his address to Congress, February 11, 1918, made the following striking declarations:

"What we are striving for is a new international order based upon broad and universal principles of right and justice . . . .

"Each part of the final settlement must be based on justice . . . .

"We believe that our own desire for a new international order, under which reason and justice and the common interests of mankind shall prevail, is the desire of enlightened men everywhere . . . .

"Having set our hand to the task of achieving it, we shall not turn back."

On September 6, 1924, at Geneva, the Fifth Assembly of the League of Nations, in which forty-six of the fifty-four nation members participated, unanimously adopted a resolution for the study by the Disarmament Commission of changes in the League Covenant and the Permanent Court of International Justice protocol to promote disarmament and compulsory arbitration, with a view to an early conference of nations.

The un-official American representatives at Geneva, made the following statement: "There is a spirit in the discussions and purposes of the countries represented here which gives every promise for the future of the world."

Whilst the Church is weeping at the foot of the cross upon which erring mankind is crucified, may we not see in these statements of Pope and President and in the resolution of the Fifth Assembly of the League of Nations and the statement of the American representatives the dawn of the better day for which Christendom is calmly waiting?
The Church and the Renaissance

The Renaissance is a natural development of society of Middle Ages.

The Renaissance is, unquestionably, one of the most remarkable phenomena in the history of humanity. At the outset it is well to note that the term Renaissance or Revival of learning is a misnomer for the vast intellectual movement of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries. What really took place was not so much a revival of learning as a flowering out of the learning of preceding centuries. It is a capital error to hold that this epoch marks an abrupt and sudden resurrection of intellectual life after long centuries of darkness. In history, as in nature, there can be no effect without a cause. From nothing comes nothing; all things are bound together by the law of cause and effect. The movement of the Renaissance was in keeping with the laws of accelerated motion: it was but the natural, progressive and uninterrupted development of the society of the Middle Ages unfolding from century to century down to the opening of the present age. Modern genius had for parent the society of the Middle Ages and grew up with it during the laborious and fruitful centuries.
of its infancy; finally, it reached the heyday of youth when, like an opening flower, it disclosed suddenly all its rich and magnificent vitality.

This view of the Renaissance is in keeping with all the laws of nature and all the teachings of history. As Pascal, the well-known French philosopher, remarks, "The whole succession of men should be considered as one man who lives on and never ceases to learn." This is especially true of modern society. From the days of Charlemagne down to the sixteenth century, modern society had not ceased to develop its acquired knowledge and increase its intellectual capital. On a certain day it found itself rich without being able to mark the precise moment when its poverty had changed into wealth. Nothing would be more interesting than to study the different phases of this intellectual progress as they succeeded one another in the course of the ages, such as the revival under Charlemagne—the development of modern languages—the progress of these languages alongside of the scientific language—the birth of popular poetry and the great epics—the appearance of the poetry of love and chivalry—the troubadours and the minnesingers—the theater with its original setting—the great philosophical and theological discussions of the twelfth century—the advent of experimental science with Roger Bacon (1)—the vast intellectual movement created by the powerful impulse of the Crusades—the elaboration of the encyclopedias in which such geniuses as Thomas of Aquin, Albert the Great (2), and such compilers as Vincent of Beauvais (3) summarized the knowledge of their times—the splendor of the plastic arts which covered all Europe with unequaled monuments—the great voyages of exploration which, from the beginning of the sixteenth century, opened up a new and strange horizon by advancing beyond the circle of existing knowledge—and then the inventions which hastened the march of progress and made new advances possible to mankind.

A few examples will illustrate my meaning. The fact that Christopher Columbus discov-

(1) Roger Bacon, English philosopher, born 1214; died at Oxford, perhaps June 11, 1294. He must be reckoned among the most eminent scholars of all time. His chief work is the “Opus Majus,” composed at the request of Pope Clem ent IV. It is a general treatise on the sciences.

(2) Albert the Great, scientist, philosopher, and theologian, born about 1206 in Swabia; died at Cologne, November 15, 1280. He is called “the Great,” and “Universal Doctor,” in recognition of his extraordinary genius and extensive knowledge. He was proficient in every branch of learning cultivated in his day, and surpassed all his contemporaries, except perhaps Roger Bacon (1214-94), in the knowledge of nature. He was a priest of the Dominican Order. He was beatified in 1622, and the Bishops of Germany, in 1872, sent to the Holy See a petition for his canonization.

(3) Vincent of Beauvais, undertook a systematic and comprehensive treatment of all branches of human knowledge in his great work: “Speculum Majus.” This book treats of theology, philosophy, natural sciences, medicine, surgery, jurisprudence, history and literature. The “Speculum Majus” contains 80 books divided into 9885 chapters, figures which give some idea of the magnitude of the work accomplished by the Dominican priest in the first half of the thirteenth century.
ered the West Indies and Vasco da Gama the East Indies does not signify that these two explorers were wonderful initiators who, appearing like meteors, drew humanity after them into fields hitherto unexplored. No! They were the heirs of those intrepid Portuguese navigators who, in a series of voyages that had extended over more than a century, had explored the entire coast of Western Africa as far as the mouth of the Congo, leaving to their successors the task of finishing the work and appropriating all the glory. In like manner when Gutenberg discovered the art of multiplying the works which contained the best that human genius had produced, he was but applying in an ingenious manner the ideas of the monks who, many centuries before, consecrated their lives to copying manuscripts, "piercing the devil with as many strokes as they traced characters upon paper." Gutenberg was the immediate successor—the intellectual heir—of those Brothers of the pen who had thought out the solution of the same problem by making themselves, so to speak, living writing-machines.

It would be easy to continue this review, for everywhere we cannot but notice that existing capital is always abundantly productive and that, at a given moment, there results inevitably an enormous increase of social wealth. This intellectual phenomenon of the sixteenth century is similar to the economic phenomenon witnessed at the beginning of the nineteenth century, when machinery multiplied production indefinitely and threw upon the markets, for the use of all, an incalculable quantity of industrial products.
Just as the discovery of machinery was made possible only by reason of the vast conquests of the natural sciences, dating from the sixteenth century, so in like manner the conquests of the sixteenth century were prepared and worked out by the sustained and constant efforts of the generations of the Middle Ages. The intellectual life of the world at that time may be likened to the top of a ladder, each rung of which was occupied by a generation.
The luscious fruits which ripen on the tree of civilization are the last results of an in-umerable series of patient and disinterested efforts; they represent the succession of generations that have disappeared.

Such being the true view of the Renaissance, it is amusing to read the contention of many writers that this imposing phenomenon was due to the fact that Greek professors, driven from the Orient by the Turkish invasions, happened to bring to amazed Western Europe the literary treasures of antiquity. These treasures of antiquity were in possession of Western Europe before the coming of the professors; from the professors it took but a small part of these treasures at a time when, by its own efforts, it had become capable of appreciating them. The revival of ancient literature in Western Europe is a consequence, not the origin, of the Renaissance.

The Renaissance leads some to imitate morals of pagan antiquity.

But all wealth—material or intellectual—has its dangers. Material riches enervate the heart by voluptuousness, intellectual riches puff up the mind with pride. And when the Gospel says: "Woe to the rich!", we may believe that these hard words apply not only to those who bend under the load of gold but also to those who succumb beneath the weight of knowledge. Neither the one nor the other can enter the Kingdom of God, if they are not poor in spirit, that is, if they do not use their treasures for the higher ends of charity. And I am convinced that it was especially to those who have attained the heights of intellectual life that the Lord wished to teach a lesson when He placed a child in the midst of His disciples and declared that heaven is closed to those who are not like unto that little one.

Now, it was to this danger, inherent in all riches and which consists in loving riches for themselves, that many men of this epoch succumbed. I do not speak of those who became attached to material wealth and to the sensual enjoyments it procures; the voluptuaries do not count in history, their social action is null, they represent the purely negative element in the destinies of humanity. Here we are concerned with those who, in modern parlance, are called the intellectuals—those who assimilated all the culture of their times and reacted on the minds of their contemporaries. For many of these intellectual life had the effect of an intoxicant: it inebriated them. They knew no measure in their enjoyment. They refused to heed the moral law of moderation. They would be humanists above all else, they were not much concerned about remaining Christians. Like the jurists of the twelfth century they gave themselves body and soul to the worship of antiquity. They were pagans because the ancients were pagans and, according to the energetic expression of Holy Writ, they became like to their idol.

Does this mean that one may not study antiquity without succumbing to its spell, without becoming pagan in mind and heart? Far from it! We have instances to the contrary. The Carolingian revival remained thoroughly Christian in inspiration, notwithstanding the preponderant part it gave to ancient literature; and the powerful geniuses of the thirteenth century, although mainly nourished by antiquity, borrowed from it only its beneficent elements and remained conscious of their own superiority. St. Thomas of Aquin has not enslaved modern thought to the philosophy of his master Aristotle; rather, he made Aristotle contribute to the demonstration of Christian truth. Dante Alighieri was devoted to Virgil and saw in him the personification of human knowledge, but he surpassed Virgil in that he loved Beatrice, the symbol of divine knowledge. These are illustrious models from whom the men of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries might have drawn inspiration. In fact, there were a great number among the humanists of that time whom literature did not turn from Christianity; among others were Rudolph Agricola (1), Vittorino da Feltre (2), Aleandro (3), Maffeo Vegio (4), Sadoletto (5), Vida (6), Pico della

(1) Rudolph Agricola, (Huysmann) born in Holland about 1443, died at Heidelberg, Germany, 1485. He was renowned for the study of the ancients, the elegance of his Latin style, his knowledge of philosophy, Hebrew and Scripture. He zealously promoted the study of classics in Germany. He was deeply religious.

(2) Vittorino De Rambaldoni da Feltre, born at Feltre Italy, in 1378; died 1446. He strove to create the perfect school. He taught Greek and Latin literature, philosophy, mathematics, etc. He gave his students plenty of physical exercise in the shape of wrestling, racing, riding, and dancing. He made the rich pay for the poor.

(3) Aleandro Girolamo (1480-1542) a humanist. He went to Paris in 1508, gave lectures in Greek, Latin and Hebrew and was made rector of the university. Later he became papal nuncio in Germany to deal with Luther's case. He was created archbishop of Brindisi, Italy, and cardinal.

(4) Maffeo, Veggio (1406-1458), poet; wrote on education.

(5) Sadoletto, Jacopo, cardinal, humanist and reformer, born at Modena, Italy, 1477; died at Rome 1547. He was versed in the various branches of Latin and Italian culture. He was secretary to Leo X. In 1517 he was appointed bishop of Carpentras, near Avignon, France. Unlike many of the humanists, he was a man of blameless life and attentive to all his duties as a priest and bishop. As poet, orator, theologian, and philosopher he was in the foremost rank of his time.

(6) Vida, Marco Girolami, humanist, born at Cremona, Italy, about 1490; died in 1566. He is the author of a great Christian epic, "Christias." He also wrote, "De Arte Poetica," inspired by the ancient Roman writer Quintilian. Vida's style is clear, elegant, harmonious and ordinarily simple.
Mirandola (1), Alexander Hegius (2), Thomas More (3), Cardinal Fisher (4), Louis

(1) Mirandola, Giovanni Pico della, Italian philosopher and scholar, born 1463; died 1494. He devoted himself to the study of philosophy and theology, Greek, Latin, Syriac, and Arabic. Towards the end of his life he destroyed his poetical works, gave up profane science and determined to give his time to the defense of Christianity against Jews, Mohammedans, and Astrologers. Savonarola delivered his funeral oration.

(2) Alexander Hegius, humanist; born probably in 1433, at Heeck, Westphalia; died 1498. He was ordained a priest when of quite mature age. He spoke and wrote a pure Ciceronian Latin, and was equally versed in Greek. He established a school for the study of these languages in Holland and simplified and improved the method of teaching.

(3) Thomas More, Blessed, knight, lord chancellor of England, author and martyr, born in London about 1477, executed at Tower Hill, July 6, 1535. He studied at Oxford, mastered the Greek and Latin languages, French, history, mathematics, and law; was made lecturer on law; wrote poetry, both Latin and English; cultivated the acquaintance of learned men, of Erasmus, among others. Besides law and the classics he read the writings of the ancient Fathers. For some time he considered the question of becoming a priest. He decided to practice law, in which profession he scored immediate success. On July 1, 1535 More was indicted for high treason at Westminster Hall before a special commission of twenty, on the charge of denying Parliament's power to confer ecclesiastical supremacy on Henry VIII. He was found guilty, sentenced to death, and executed five days later. Blessed Thomas More was formally beatified by Pope Leo XIII., December 26, 1886. Of all his writings the most famous is the "Utopia."

(4) John Fisher, Blessed, cardinal, Bishop of Rochester, and martyr; born at Beverley, Yorkshire, England, 1459; died June 22, 1535. At Cambridge he received successively the degrees of B. A. in 1487, M. A. in 1491, D. D. in 1501, was elected Vice-Chancellor in 1501, Chancellor in 1504, to which post he was re-elected annually for ten years and then appointed for life. Besides his share in the Lady Margaret's foundations, Fisher gave further proof of his genuine zeal for learning by inducing Erasmus to visit Cambridge. He is the author of twenty-six works in all, several of which have been reprinted several times. He denied the spiritual supremacy of the king; opposed openly the divorce of Henry VIII and Catherine of Aragon and refused to acknowledge the legitimacy of the offspring of Henry VIII and Anna Boleyn. He was sent to the tower of London April 26, 1534, sentenced to death and executed. He was formally beatified by Pope Leo XIII in 1886.
Vives (1), our own admirable Cleynaerts (2).

But we must admit that all minds have not the same degree of virtue or of intellectual health. Many fell victims to the poisonous perfume which issued from the tomb of antiquity. They were not startled by the vices which Christian morality reproves, when these vices were idealized and surrounded with all the prestige of poetry. They envied the absolute liberty of ancient thought which, free from the fetters of truth, wandered at will in the boundless field of philosophic speculation. Often, unwittingly, they were drawn away from the sure positions which Christian education had secured for mind and heart. They lowered the water-mark of morality to bring it down to the level of antiquity; they let go the truths which they

---

(1) Vives, Juan Luis, Spanish humanist and philosopher, born at Valencia in 1492; died at Bruges, Belgium, May 6, 1540. He first studied at the University of Paris, 1519, was appointed professor at the University of Louvain, where he was associated with Erasmus; in 1523 he became attached to the Corpus Christi College, Oxford, was banished from England for opposing the divorce of Henry VIII. He is the author of numerous works of great merit and popularity, on Christian piety, teaching and education, political economy and philosophy. He also showed himself an organizer of public relief.

(2) Cleynaerts, Belgian Priest, and Orientalist. His thorough knowledge of the Hebrew and Arabic languages, literature and history led him to advocate preaching to the Jews and the Mohammedans rather than fighting them with the sword. He strove to establish at Louvain, a seminary for training priests for missionary work among Mohammedans. He spent some months in Africa evangelizing the followers of Mohammed. He died in Granada, Spain.
thought enchained them but which in reality sustained them.

The result was inevitable. The hope that they might keep themselves intact with imaginations so infatuated was as vain as the pretensions of certain young men of our time who, under pretext of literary studies, ask of their confessor permission to read all the productions of the pornographic writers of our day, believing that they can escape from such association with unsullied imagination, sound moral judgment, unswerving will! Thus the passionate study of the Greeks and Romans produced on the different classes of admirers various phenomena. We shall classify these phenomena and then strive to estimate them at their true value.

The Renaissance leads all to exaggerate literary merits of pagan antiquity.

In the sixteenth century everyone—the best Christians as well as the most pronounced pagans—fell with exemplary docility under the literary charm of antiquity. We may call this the minimum of pagan influence. It was the universal conviction that the ancients had conceived types of the beautiful which could never be equaled, and that we moderns have to imitate these types unvaryingly, if we wish in turn to realize an esthetic ideal. No one doubted that the ancients had created the moulds into which we must cast the productions of our own genius if we would escape the penalty of producing barbarous and monstrous works; and that our highest artistic effort was to imitate the ancients and thus to reach the perfection of the works which they had drawn from their imagination. It was irrevocably decreed that the role of creator was reserved to antiquity and that the modern age must content itself with the character of imitator.

This odd conception of esthetic life is explained in great measure by the ignorance of those who formulated it. For a long time past the Middle Ages had ceased to be known, nor were they to be known again for a long time to come. The judgments of Boileau, in his Art Poétique, are very significant in this respect. He was convinced—and he expresses his conviction with delightful assurance—that our devout forefathers knew no kind of poetry, were ignorant of rhythm, and were without the pleasures of the theatre. These assertions will appear absurd to him who knows that the Troubadours (1) and the Minnesingers (2) of the Middle Ages are the

(1) Troubadours, lyrical poets who flourished from the eleventh to the latter part of the thirteenth century, principally in southern France, Catalonia, Aragon, and northern Italy. Their poetry was characterized by an almost exclusive devotion to the subject of chivalric love.

(2) Minnesingers were German lyric poets and singers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries, so called because love was the chief theme of their poems.
fathers of modern lyric poetry, that from that period date all our epics—the incomparable Chanson de Roland (1), the Poem of the Cid (2), the Nibelungenlied (3), the Roman du Renard (4),—that the theatre never enjoyed greater popularity nor exerted a greater social influence than in the Middle Ages. No wonder that in our own day Littré lectures good Nicholas Despréaux Boileau and suggests that his judgments are, hardly worthy of the author of the “Art Poétique.”

But there is something more than ignorance

(1) Chanson de Roland, a French epic, put into writing about the year 1080, and by an unknown author, is the most celebrated of the history songs of the Middle Ages. It is the story of the death of Roland at Roncevalles and Charlemagne's vengeance. It places vividly before the imagination the France of those times, warlike, violent, but fairly animated with an ardent faith. It has recently been done into English, in the original measure, by Mr. Charles Scott Moncrieff, under the title, “The Song of Roland.”—Chapman and Hall, London.

(2) Poem of the Cid or Romances of the Cid, a Spanish poem composed by an unknown author about A. D. 1200. The Cid is the principal national hero of Spain, famous for his exploits in the wars with the Moors. The poem is a spirited exhibition of national peculiarities in the chivalrous times of Spain.

(3) Nibelungenlied or Song of Nibelungen, a Middle High German epic, the greatest monument of early German in the first half of the thirteenth century. The Nibelungen, in the German legend, were a race of Northern dwarfs, conquered by the mythological hero, Siegfried.

(4) The “Roman du Renard” is a vast collection, formed early in the thirteenth century, of stories in verse thrown together without sequence or connection. In all its parts the same hero appears again and again, “Renard” the fox. The action round about Renard is carried on by many other characters, such as the wolf, the lion, the cock, pseudo-animals that mingle with their bearing and instinct as animals, traits and feelings borrowed from humanity. It is a kind of parody of the “history songs.” It ridicules the nobles, feudal society and feudal institutions.
in the literary view of the people of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries: there is a real infatuation. It was, alas, at that time that good Father Maffei sought permission to read his Breviary in Greek, that his style might not be spoiled by the bad Latin of the Church. It was at that time that Ferreri, who had been intrusted by Leo X with the reform of the Latin Breviary, disfigured its most beautiful hymns under pretext of removing its barbarisms, treated the Blessed Virgin as a nymph and a goddess, and spoke of God as the sovereign of the gods. And what are we to say of the prejudices regarding plastic art! Men who lived and died under the shadow of our marvelous Gothic cathedrals disfigured these noble monuments to make them look like the Greek temples with their feeble and cold beauty. They had under their eyes the radiant majesty of the portals of Rheims, of Paris and of Amiens—and they despised them! One of the most enlightened and, certainly, one of the most sympathetic of the great writers of the seventeenth century—our good Fénelon—formulated against the art of our fathers a condemnation whose every line and whose every word is an outrage against truth, good taste and esthetic sense. This strange blindness can find explanation only in the a priori conviction that there is no beauty except in ancient art and in its imitations: the absolute artistic superiority of the ancients was an axiom as incontroverted as the dogmas of the Christian faith.

Infatuation with pagan antiquity begets in some contempt for Christianity.

In vain would one have tried to make these persons understand that they were injuring Christianity in considering it incapable of attaining an ideal of beauty; they would have replied to you with Boileau:

De la religion les mystères terribles
D'ornements égayés ne sont pas susceptibles.*

And if one had urged the matter further, they would have declared that there is nothing in common between religion and esthetics—very much as in our own day, in our own country (Belgium), some members of the Right say there is nothing in common between religion and economic questions, while members of the Left say that there is nothing in common between religion and politics.

Who does not see that already there was, even among the best, a real diminution of the Christian faith, since they excluded its influence from the whole vast intellectual domain, dividing their minds into two compartments—one reserved to art and poetry, the other to religion. They did not know, or they had lost sight of the fact, that Christianity is like the sun which must penetrate everything to vivify everything; that there is such a thing as Christian esthetics just as there is Christian politics and Christian economics; that the beautiful, like the true and the good, is one of the aspects of the Supreme Being, God; and that, in art as in nature, nothing is beautiful which does not bear on its brow the reflection of the uncreated Beauty. It seems that in those days no one suspected these truths which are an integral part of Christian doctrine; they had to await the Genius of Christianity by Chateaubriand to be reminded of the fact that the Catholic religion possesses some beauty.

* "The awful mysteries of religion are not susceptible of cheerful ornaments."

Imbued with such veneration for ancient literature, how could one keep himself free from a like infatuation for the civilization of which this literature was the expression? For the genius of ancient literature with seductive eloquence and poetic beauty depicted the ancient world in a radiant and almost divine light. And the men of the Renaissance, viewing it through a halo, pictured to themselves an antiquity which had never existed, an antiquity where everything was beautiful and grand, luminous and serene, where nobility of heart went side by side with largeness of mind, an antiquity where all things human took on more than natural proportions, where the historic heroes had the gait of demi-gods, and from which emerged sages, walking with their disciples in the shade of the Grove of Academus (1), discussing the existence of God and the immortality of the soul. Thus the Christian imagination of the men of the Renaissance projected its own mental image on the clouds which veiled the past and, without knowing it, admired itself in a world which was nothing but its own reflection.

But it may be objected that there is no great harm in all this and that we have here but one of those ever recurring illusions which will never cease to baffle men. But this contention will hardly hold, for I notice that all who have professed this enthusiastic veneration for the ancients have been correspondingly unjust towards Christian society and Christianity. If it were true that the most noble representatives of the human race are found among the pagans, if it were true, as Thiers (2) stated in an official report, "that antiquity is the most beautiful thing in the world", then, to be logical, one would have to say with the poet:

"No need there were for Mary to give birth." (3)

(1) The Grove of Academus was the resort where Plato, the great Greek philosopher taught for nearly fifty years, till his death in 348 B. C.

(2) Thiers, Louis Adolphe (1797-1877) French journalist, statesman and historian.

(3) Mestier non era partorir Maria. (Dante, Purgatorio, III, 39.)
In other words Christianity would be useless—nay more—it would be responsible for the decadence of humanity, if since its advent mankind had lost all that constitutes true genius. Christianity would have been but an empty parenthesis: by closing the parenthesis and returning to the sources of antiquity, the human mind would find itself again and resume the interrupted course of its glorious destinies.

Some admirers of the Renaissance attempt to paganize the modern world.

This conclusion was so logical that it soon found some who had the courage to deduce it. In contradistinction of those naïve persons who Christianized antiquity, they would paganize the modern world—and they began the experiment with themselves. They took from antiquity its manner of thinking and its way of living. Shaking from their minds the yoke of dogma and from their hearts the burden of the moral law, they undertook to use, as they liked, the powerful faculties of thinking and of willing which belong to man and whose use providential laws have at all times regulated. They wantonly stripped themselves of the twofold superiority which they owed to Christianity, and rejoiced in descending again to the level of pagan naturalism, where grace was absent. They forgot the origin of man, they forgot, above all, his last end; they abandoned that narrow road by which the Master wished us to enter into eternal life; they took the broad way of living, which knows neither the joys of sacrifice freely accepted, nor the consolations of sorrow borne with resignation, nor the sublime delights of charity which raises man up to God. For them, as for the ancients, their whole existence was centered on voluptuousness and glory—this was their twofold ideal of life.

Of voluptuousness I shall not speak, except to state that no ancient was exempt from its defilements, that the most celebrated men of antiquity, even when they triumphed over their senses, mastered them for the time only, to succumb to them later. There did not exist among the pagans a soul truly proof against voluptuousness, and, if one were found, the exception would but prove the rule.

Love of glory is no doubt a more elevated sentiment, and at times we find in antiquity examples of it which command our respect. I know of no more beautiful instance of it than the words spoken by the dying Epaminondas in reply to those who lamented that he left no children to inherit his glory: "Friends, I die content; I leave two immortal daughters, Leuctra and Mantinea". () Noble and proud words and worthy of a hero! Nevertheless there are other words more beautiful. "Da mihi nesciri!" (Grant me, O Lord, to remain unknown!) Thus spoke the author of the most beautiful book ever penned by the hand of man—we do not here consider the inspired Gospel—and this wish of the sublime author of the Imitation has been realized for five centuries: he has remained hidden behind his masterpiece, greater in his effacement than the Thebean in the exaltation of his name. () One should not despise the love of glory when it becomes a stimulant to great actions, but we must admit that Christian humility has been productive of greater actions and of actions which cost less to society. To reverse the role of these two motives and to exalt the former at the expense of the latter would be a step backward in civilization.

(*) Epaminondas, Theban general who defeated the Spartans at Leuctra in 371 B. C. and was victorious and mortally wounded at Mantinea in 362 B. C.

It would have been less objectionable if, in reviving the passion of antiquity for the perpetuation of one's name, the humanists of the Renaissance had at least followed the noble idea of Epaminondas and not the manner of the pedants. For most of them were pedants indeed, dreaming that immortality might come to them from a well-turned distich, or a new expression, or a pleasant saying. Read in the Femmes Savantes of Molière the scene between Trissotin and Vadius, and you will have acquaintance with almost all the pagan and semi-pagan humanists of the Renaissance. In their books, in their correspondence, in their conversation, there is in evidence a childish vanity, an extreme susceptibility, an amazing infatuation. If you but seem to touch with disrespectful hands one of the rays of their halo, at once these demi-gods will turn against you in coarse invectives, hurl at your head all the abuse of the fishwoman’s vocabulary, forgetting that, though immortals, they are talking and acting as street porters! This is all the more pitiful when one considers that, with all their pretensions to renown, most of these great men have drawn on posterity letters of exchange which posterity has allowed to be protested. Erasmus of Rotterdam, our quasi-compatriot, is the most celebrated and the most estimable type of this class of minds. In his own time he was adulated as a god and actually looked upon himself as a guiding genius, whilst he was simply a bookman crammed with Latin and Greek, although we must admit that he had well digested these languages.

(*) "The Imitation of Christ" was at first published anonymously in A. D. 1418. Its authorship was until recently in dispute, being attributed to various spiritual writers, St. Bernard, St. Bonaventure, Innocence III, Walter Hilton, Giovanni Gersen and others. The authorship of Thomas a Kempis has been completely established in recent years.

If from the thinkers we pass on to the men of action, we shall find paganism put into practice with astounding boldness. At this time we find a legion of men who had entirely given up the Christian idea that they might conform to the pagan morality of pleasure and success. They abounded in all ranks of society, were not lacking among the clergy, and, alas, were to be found even on the Chair of Peter. Pope Alexander VI is the most sinister incarnation of paganism under the tiara: serene and smiling amidst the mire of vices, he displayed with an astonishing lack of conscience the spectacle of his turpitudes; and even in the winter of old age, he prolonged, beneath the eyes of an astonished world, the wild revel of an existence lacking in moral sense.

Alexander VI is the type of the voluptuary—nothing more. (*) His son Caesar Borgia presents to us the most finished type of the pagan politician. Young, beautiful, brave, intelligent, friend of the arts, model of courtesy, he is, in spite of all these external qualities, the most cruel, the most perverse, the most unscrupulous of men. The conquest of the greatest possible power and glory is for him the only ideal of life, and it seems never

* Inasmuch as an authority like Kurth, and the best Catholic historians generally, have agreed in a very unfavorable judgement of Alexander VI, it is very interesting to note that the Rt. Rev. P. De Roo, author of the "History of America before Columbus" maintains that the verdict of history regarding Alexander VI should be entirely reversed, that the case of this Pontiff is an astonishing case of complete calumny by the hostile writers of his time. Monsignor De Roo has published "Materials for a History of Pope Alexander VI, his Relatives and his Times" in five volumes, in which he supports his contention by means of hitherto unstudied documents, especially from the secret archives of the Vatican. In the first volume he contends that Caesar Borgia was not the son of Alexander VI, but the son of Alexander's first nephew. The Encyclopedia Press, New York, 1924. to have entered his mind that such an ideal could be limited by any moral law. "There is nothing in common between religion and politics! Politics is an art which one cultivates for itself and which knows but one law, that of success." Thus Caesar Borgia was taught by his master, the most genial, the most atrocious of all the representatives of the Renaissance, the man whose name has been given to a political system of deceit and immorality, a system which utterly ignores Christianity:—this man is Nicholas Machiavelli.

Strikingly expressive is the portrait of this heartless and unfeeling genius, which may be seen today in the Uffizi Gallery at Florence. Note the excessively sharp profile, the cruel fox-like snout, where you may read the combination of sanguinary baseness of instinct and wonderful acumen of mind: you will catch yourself shivering, and you will quickly turn away with an impression of uneasiness and fright. Moreover Machiavelli has left us a portrait of himself in his writings, especially in his treatise The Prince which for centuries has been the breviary of absolute monarchs, even of those who wrote anti-Machiavellian books, as Frederick II of Prussia (*). It is not necessary to state that

* Charles V was a reader of Machiavelli. His ungalant remark at the raising of the siege of Metz: Fortune is a woman, she does not love old men, was inspired by "The Prince" of Machiavelli, ch. XXV.—G. K.
Machiavelli had no more morals than faith, and that this almost diabolical contemner of the Papacy led a private life which was but a tissue of infamies.

I have mentioned only a few characteristic types; but in order to make known all the varieties of pagan celebrities of this epoch, it would be necessary to give other names—beginning with Lorenzo dalla Valle, who boldly professed in his writings the principles of the most abject epicurism, down to Pomponazzi, who did not fear to deny the doctrine of the immortality of the soul and who ended his life by suicide. To give an idea of the moral and intellectual atmosphere of the time, one should at least recall the extraordinary fortune of the ignoble Aretino, a sort of Leo Taxil of the sixteenth century, though possessing more talent, before whom princes trembled, and who touched the pocket-books of kings who feared the power of this pamphleteer. All these persons, by their talent, by their boldness, by their number, and through skilful grouping, give the impression that they are the true representatives of their time, the general expression of the spirit of the Renaissance. And, indeed, if the intellectual movement which bears this name must be judged by the men who took control of it, it is certain that the Renaissance was a return to the ideas and the aspirations of paganism. We deny this conclusion because we reject the premises—but it was very easy to be deceived therein.

Some condemned whole movement because of its abuses.

People were deceived from the first. Many sincere minds were alarmed at the unheard of licentiousness of thought, often followed by a like licentiousness of morals, and they attributed to the intellectual movement itself the scandals which were but an abuse. They decried art, literature and science, because they held these to be directly responsible for the moral and religious crisis of their time. Seeing that intellectual culture produced such fruits, they turned from it and confined themselves to divine science. This is, alas, to-day as then, the conduct of honest people who have more good will than keenness of mind, in whom are verified the words of the Gospel that the children of darkness are wiser in their generation than the children of light. The temptation to act thus is so strong that, for the greater number, it is well-nigh irresistible. It is so expeditious, so convenient, for minds of narrow vision, to condemn as a whole all intellectual and social progress because of the abuses to which it gives occasion!

This narrowness of view, though it usually shelters itself under the cloak of religion, really injures religion by making it appear opposed to all progress and incompatible with every development of civilization. This is not the broad and vivifying spirit of Christianity, it is the narrow-mindedness of the grossest fanaticism which dictates, at all epochs, the attitude of reactionaries. "If these books say the same things as the Koran, they are useless; if they say the contrary, they are hurtful; in either case, they must be burned." This language is worthy of Calif Omar setting fire to the library of Alexandria; but it is too often held by zealous Christians, without suspecting that they are such good Mussulmans! It was, for instance, in 1507, the language of Adrian de Corneto, who using other words of comparison, strove to establish that all science is contained in Holy Writ and that it is folly to seek it elsewhere.

It was likewise the language of the rigorists of the moral order, who correctly attributed the corruption of their time to luxury, and who imagined that they could remedy it by bringing back the people, if need be by force, to the simplicity of morals and to the observance of the evangelical counsels. They dreamed of changing the world into a vast convent where each inhabitant would be subject to the severe observance of monastic rules, and where in a gigantic auto-da-fe they would burn, to-day all the products of frivolous and corrupting luxury, to-morrow all those who would not forewear its worship. What a beautiful dream for high and visionary minds, who thought they could do without human liberty in the establishment of the Kingdom of God! So they often dreamed in those republics partly democratic, partly theocratic, such as the Puritans founded in the American colonies, and Calvin (*) in the Commune of Geneva. We recognize the same character in the enterprise of that high-minded enthusiast, the monk Jerome Savonarola, whose noble ideals and sincere zeal for the Catholic faith are beyond question. This unfortunate reformer was dictator of Florence long enough to get the notion that he had realized his ideal and also to draw upon himself the furious opposition which brought him to the funeral pile.

Savonarola did not understand the law of growth which rules mankind, as it rules nature, and which does not permit society—any more than the individual—to have the same manners and the same mode of life in its old age as in its early years. Like the individual, humanity passes through various phases and while it always retains its elemental character it presents a diversity in its manifestations. Gradually, as it advances, it strips itself of the traits of (*) Calvin, John, born at Noyon, France, 1509, and died at Geneva, 1564. In Geneva the clergy, assisted by the elders, governed despotically and in detail the actions of every citizen. In this matter Geneva set an example to the later Puritans, who did all in their power to imitate its discipline.

youth to put on those of old age; it loses buoyancy to gain experience; it gathers the fruits of its former labors, extends its knowledge, sweetens the relations among men, studies itself and calls to its activities the control of the moralist and of the scientist. In thus developing itself according to its nature, society does not put itself in contradiction to Christianity, because the faith of Jesus Christ does not condemn any human faculty nor demand of civilization the sacrifice of any of its conquests, provided these labors and all the enjoyments which flow from them remain subordinate to the higher law of charity. When then, righteously moved by the miseries of his time, Savonarola thought to remedy them by reforms which offended nature and which were worse than the evil itself, he acted blindly and was bound to provoke the frightful reaction of which he himself was the first and most pathetic victim.

The Catholic Church on the contrary headed the movement in the right direction.

The Catholic Church did not enter the way into which Savonarola wished to draw her. In face of the great movement of the Renaissance, she remembered her eternal mission; she recalled not only that she is the religion of people still in infancy and of poor communities, but also that she is to lead to God the rich nations and enlightened civilization.
Far from cursing the riches of science and the opulence of arts—though she often saw them misused—she blessed them and wished to make them contribute to the glory of God and the salvation of souls. And, with this largeness of view and this boldness of enterprise which we have recognized in her in former crises, instead of opposing the future and being crushed by it, instead of holding aloof and being left behind, she boldly grasped the banner of intellectual progress and headed the movement which drew humanity towards its mighty destinies.

I do not say that this attitude of the Church towards the Renaissance was always the result of formal deliberation, or that the chiefs of the hierarchy were always conscious of the fateful bearing of the part they played. Were they themselves, as private persons, not subject to the charm of artistic and literary life; and does not their surrender to the seductions that surrounded them sufficiently explain the interest of the Church in art and literature? And were there not among them some who became intoxicated with the wine of the Renaissance to the point of totally forgetting the Catholic spirit, forgetting that they were priests, bishops, cardinals, remembering only that they were humanists? But it is precisely because the movement was of such intensity that one is astonished that, instead of allowing herself to be drawn on by the current, the Church should have undertaken to direct it and that she should have succeeded in a large measure. She did not cry anathema against it, as the busy-bodies would have wished; she did not sacrifice the legitimate demands of the Christian spirit, as did the Humanists; she proposed to create, in the full meaning of the term, a revival which would be Catholic—and she succeeded. The names of Pius II, Nicholas V, Julius II, and Leo X recall the most powerful and the most efficacious protection which the intellectual life of the human race ever received from a sovereign authority.

I do not intend here to recount in detail the history of this incomparable patronage of science, art, and literature, or to show the Sovereign Pontiffs surrounded by the glorious phalanx of artists—at their head the unrivaled Bramante (1), Michelangelo (2) and

(1) Bramante (1444-1514) Italian painter and architect designed St. Peter's in Rome. His work in Milan is characterized by a pronounced picturesque decorative style, whilst his artistic productions in Rome are, as far as possible, free from all external decorations, and impressive by reason of their proportions, grandeur, and power.

(2) Michelangelo (Buonarroti), 1475-1564, Italian sculptor, painter, and architect, one of the greatest artists of all times. At the request of Pope Julius II he painted the world-renowned frescoes of the Creation, the Fall, the Preparation for the coming of the Redeemer, and the Last Judgment, in the Sistine Chapel of the Vatican.
the divine Raphael (*). But I may say in general and without fear of exaggeration that no century has seen—that probably no century will ever see — such an ensemble of works as the Dome of St. Peter’s, the Sistine Chapel, the Stanze and the Loggie of the Vatican. If — unlike Jerusalem, Antioch, Athens, Bagdad, and Cordova—Rome is not today a tomb in ruins, with her grandeur forever destroyed; if the Eternal City is ever resplendent, in the eyes of the entire world, with the incomparable splendor which surrounds her sanctuaries, her museums, her libraries; if the world does not cease to go to her in pilgrimage as to the living center of civilization, it is to the Popes of the Renaissance that she is indebted. It is not the ruins of some monuments of antiquity which would entitle her, in the eyes of the world, so far to outrank Athens with its Parthenon, or Treves with its Porta Nigra. The Popes have made the Eternal City a page of apologetics, written under their dictation by the greatest artists of the world, a page which will speak from century to century with superhuman eloquence.

But here, as in all other things, Rome is but the symbol of the Catholic Church herself.

(*) Raphael (Raffaele Sanzio d’Urbino), 1483-1520 Italian painter, the founder of the Roman school of painting of the Renaissance, preeminent as a draftsman, a colorist, and a master of graceful composition and remarkable for the wide range of his subjects and the great variety of his style. He painted the world-famed “Transfiguration” and “Sistine Madonna.”
Thanks to the Popes of the Renaissance, the Catholic Church wears henceforth upon her brow a new tiara, which renders her sacred even in the eyes of those who despise the Renaissance: it is the threefold crown of science, of art, and of poetry. She has taken under her patronage these three, the proudest and the freest in the world, and accompanied by them, she marches on through history in dazzling glory and magnificence. In accordance with the wish of the dying Nicholas V, set forth in a discourse which seems to express the mind of this great Pope and his life better than any other document, she subjugates the human imagination and compels admiration by the incomparable prestige of her esthetic greatness.

One feels this deeply when at Rome, under the lofty cupola which shelters the tomb of the Fisherman of men and from which shines forth in gigantic letters this divine sentence: “Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church.” No one, I think, can wholly escape the spell of these surroundings: neither the Christian who feels his heart expand, nor the indifferent one who finds again a remnant of Catholic joy and pride, nor the dissenter who must feel in his inmost heart a melancholy regret for the broken unity of the ancient Christian faith. As to the enemies of the Church, however intense their hatred, however vicious the blows they deal her, they feel here more than elsewhere the presence of Him Who has said: "The wicked shall see, and shall be angry, he shall gnash with his teeth and pine away; the desire of the wicked shall perish." (Ps. III., 11).

Importance of stand taken by Church at this turning point of history.

This is, I think, the aspect under which we must consider the role of the Church and of the Papacy at this turning point of history, known as the Renaissance. I am aware that this is not the opinion of everyone. There are to-day many people, especially among the best Christians and among those who aim to restore Catholic inspiration to art and poetry, who regret the great part taken by the Church in the work of the Renaissance. They think that she protected the Humanists and the artists more than she should have done, that she did not safeguard the tradition of Catholic art and Catholic thought against the new ideas, and that she needlessly sacrificed to the taste of the time the elements of Christian vitality. They would almost picture paganism invading the sanctuaries and making the Church of Christ the prisoner of the age.

And certainly, as I have hinted above, there is no lack of circumstances to give to this judgment an appearance of truth. By bringing together all the data furnished by the shocking chronicles of the sixteenth century, in Rome as elsewhere, by gathering such sayings and such actions of princes of the Church as were manifestly opposed to the law of God, it would be easy to paint a picture which would call forth strong condemnation. But likewise, one might take the opposite elements and picture a society worthy of the first centuries of Christianity. But history need not resort to special pleading.

The truth is that if the Church, in face of the widespread intellectual movement whose origin and character we have considered, had confined herself to protest and reaction and had wrapped herself in tradition as does the vanquished soldier in the folds of his flag, she would have permitted civilization to leave her behind; she would have lost all contact with the future and would have had no influence upon the elite of mankind; she would have become a closed chapel where the faithful—dwindling in numbers day by day—would meet only to weep over ruins and to anathematize the age. We should be thankful that she resisted the temptation and that, thanks to the wisdom of the Popes, she rose to the height of the movement of the sixteenth century, that she has remained abreast of the times down to the twentieth century, and that she will not fail to keep pace with all the movements of future ages. The essential point is that, in throwing open her sanctuaries to the new intellectual life of mankind, she did not sacrifice a particle of the higher truth, a single commandment of the moral law, a single article of her creed. No doubt, it was difficult at times to reconcile the severe requirements of the eternal laws with the bold movements of the modern spirit, and often the moralist and the lover of the beautiful must have been shocked at the poorly veiled contradictions which resulted from the union of the Church and the Renaissance. But it is none the less true that the Church of the sixteenth century has handed down intact the patrimony of primitive Christianity. An anecdote which I read for the first time in the beautiful History of the Popes by Pastor presents this thought in so expressive a manner that I cannot resist the pleasure of repeating it as the crowning point of this lecture.

Julius II, as you all know, had asked Bramante, the greatest and boldest genius of the Renaissance, to re-build the Basilica of St. Peter on the Vatican Hill. Bramante combined boundless faith in the principles of his art with contempt of the past—a failing common to nearly all the artists of that epoch. He began by demolishing the ancient Vatican Basilica which, it is true, threatened to collapse, but he acted with a haste and lack of respect that were inexcusable. In the boldness of his genius, he went even further. In order to make the new church more imposing, he wished to change its orientation and, for his purpose, he thought of moving the tomb which, for fifteen centuries, has been the inviolate asylum of the sacred remains of the Prince of the Apostles. But on this point Pope Julius II, who so far had granted every request of his artist, gave a categorical refusal. Bramante would not be silenced; he brought forward a number of reasons, some from considerations of art, others from the view-point of religion. He contended that if the tomb were moved as he desired it would be in better harmony with the enlarged edifice and would add to the piety of the faithful; in a word, he used every argument and pleaded with a vehemence and an obstinacy which seemed likely to triumph in the end. But the Pope was inexorable; he declared that under no consideration would he allow any one to touch the tomb of him upon whom Jesus Christ had built the universal Church. Art had to give way to religion. The remains of St. Peter were not taken from their crypt and the orientation of the church was not changed.

This story is significant. It tells friends and enemies alike that the Catholic Church accommodates herself to all progress of thought and to all forms of art, but that—built upon the rock of the eternal truths—she permits no one to change the axis of the world which she has set towards Heaven.
The Church and the Revolution

On May 5, 1789, there convened at Versailles the States-General of France (*). Surely no one could have then foretold that within less than five years royalty would be suppressed, that the king and queen would be put to death, that the dauphin would die a slow death in a cobbler’s shop, that the nobility would have to choose between the guillotine and exile, that the Catholic religion would be proscribed, that a girl of the demi-monde would ascend the altar of Notre Dame of Paris under the name of Goddess of Reason and that, among the deputies who took part in the procession, there would be one, the most ridiculous, the most awkward, and perhaps the most shallow of them all, who would cut the throats of most of his colleagues. Had such a prediction been made, it would have met with derision and indignation. This series of unlikely suppositions, dramatized after their occurrence by La Harpe, in his famous Prédication

(*) In order to reform existing abuses Louis XVI, in compliance with the universal request of all classes of the French people, convened the States-General, or the assembly of the three orders of the kingdom, namely, the Clergy, the Nobility, and the Third Estate or Commonality. These had not been in session since 1614.
de Cazotte, falls far short of the frightful realities which sank the ancient regime into an abyss of blood.

Revolution unforeseen.

There had been nothing to foretell the awful catastrophe to the generation which witnessed those scenes unprecedented in the annals of history. Apart from certain black specks which could forebode no evil except to the most trained eye, the sky was serene and the morrow seemed favorable. The dynasty was popular; this had been very evident at the birth of the dauphin. The election records of 1789 attest that the immense majority of voters were sincerely devoted to religion and to royalty alike. It is true that various reforms were demanded; but all these, or almost all, had to do with undeniable abuses, which were no longer defended by any one, not even by those who profited by them. And then the gentleness of manners was such that there was nothing to fear even from the most energetic reformers. Every one boasted of being a sensible man, just as in other times, one would have been ashamed of it. Literature, that supreme authority of the epoch, took more and more the character of the idyl. An atmosphere of benevolence seemed about to envelop and permeate all society. People had acquired such reliance in the native goodness of humanity and in the excellence of the principles of philosophy that they loved to think of the future under the aspect of a golden age, which they believed they were about to attain. The first measures of the Constituent Assembly (1), voted by acclamation and often on the motion of the privileged classes themselves, were not such as to open the eyes of men. The Feast of the Federation (July 14, 1790) was, in this respect, a real illusion. Every one believed that the pact of human fraternity had been sealed on the basis of liberty. The error was of long duration. They were still exchanging love kisses long after claps of thunder had been heard in the peaceful sky. Even the imagination of the sinister cut-throats held fast to the vision of the great human pastoral. It was in an azure-colored garment, with a sheaf of ears of grain and flowers in hand, that the sensible Robespierre (2), the eloquent opponent of capital punishment, was to celebrate the feast of the Supreme Being on an altar in mid-air. He dreamed, no doubt, of the welfare of the human race, of the sweetness of country life, of the charms of virtue and innocence—and this but a few days before the frightful awakening of the ninth of Thermidor!

(1) The Third Estate, having as many members as the other two orders of the States-General combined, insisted on voting per head instead of per order, and thus obtained the preponderance in the States-General. The new assembly thus formed with the Third Estate in control was called the Constituent Assembly, because it had for its object the formation of a constitution.

(2) Robespierre, born at Arras, May 6, 1759. He was a lawyer; was elected to the Third Estate of the States-General in 1789; became the leader of the Extreme Left in the Constituent Assembly, and one of the foremost orators of the Revolution. He was elected deputy to the Convention in 1792; was identified with the "Reign of Terror"; was overthrown in the Convention July 27, 1794, the 9th Thermidor, year II of the Republican calendar, and guillotined the next day.

Pu\n
Purpose of Revolution destruction of ancient regime.
If conditions were such, how explain this atrocious Revolution, this hideous debauch, whither sacrilegious folly and sanguinary impiety led dismayed humanity for years? How understand this vertigo which, at a given moment, took hold of the first nation of the world, and made it turn round and round and stagger like a drunken man, and so affected it that up to the present it has not recovered its former stability? Are these the necessary crises which accompany the bringing forth of a new world? Are they the agonizing convulsions of an ancient civilization? Are they the tragical phases of that gigantic struggle between two powers which is going on forever for the possession of society—the struggle between good and evil, between truth and error, between God and Satan?
Certainly it would be idle to attribute the Revolution to the abuses of the ancient regime. It would be assigning a most insignificant cause to an effect whose proportions are almost beyond calculation. There have been abuses at all times, and when the French Revolution burst forth there were abuses elsewhere as well as in France. But there was not everywhere else, as in France, a most sincere good will, on the part of the ruling classes, to extirpate abuses. Louis XVI, who was called the best of kings, set the example in this respect. He restored to the Protestants their civil rights, he suppressed the rack, he convened the Assembly of the Notables (*), and when, finally, he took the initiative in calling together the States-General (which had not been in session since 1614) it was to bring about the collaboration of the king and his people in working out the necessary reforms. There was the same good will, the same sincerity among the two privileged classes, namely the clergy and the nobility. They both generously sacrificed their most precious prerogatives for the sake of public peace and the general welfare, the clergy with spontaneous resignation, the nobility with rather thoughtless enthusiasm. Never before had privileged classes renounced their privileges for reasons of patriotism and philosophy. It may be said that if the Revolution had risen to do away with abuses, it would have come to a close after the night of the Fourth of August, 1789, that is, when it had hardly begun.

(*) The Assembly of Notables, a council of prominent persons from the three classes of the State convoked by the kings on extraordinary occasions. The most famous assemblies were those of 1787 and 1788, summoned by Louis XVI. In the assembly of 1787 there were only twenty-seven representatives of the Third Estate out of a total of a hundred and forty-four members.

It is therefore false to pretend that the Revolution was caused by the abuses of the ancient regime. The Revolution was more than a mere effort to resist abuses which had ceased to exist before it triumphed. Its purpose—if it had a purpose at all—was not the reform of the regime, but its destruction. A blind, irresistible force, it acted with all the power of a furious element let loose and it overthrew society from top to bottom, uprooting everything after the manner of a cyclone, leaving the ground strewn with ruins wherever it had passed. But, as in meteorology one may give reasons for the appearance of cyclones, so also, in history, the outburst of similar catastrophes may be traced to its causes.

Free thought one of the causes of Revolution.

The revolutionary spirit is far anterior to the Revolution. In France, as elsewhere, one may trace it back to the Renaissance from which it proceeds as the river flows from the glacier. The Renaissance, as we have seen, had developed two parallel currents whose junction, at a given moment, had become the great destructive force. The first current, that of free thought, held course among the cultured classes; the other, that of free enjoyment, had its source in high society. For a long time, the freethinkers held aloof, with a disdainful indifference for the great religious struggles. They saw in these nothing but the quarrels of bigots, and when they became involved in them, it was to strike with the weapon of irony the one of the two combatants who at the time appeared the more formidable. Christianity under all its forms inspired them with equal aversion. Their admiration went out only to pagan antiquity, which had neither dogmas to bridle the mind nor priesthood to interpret its dogmas. Encamped on the field of pure naturalism, they waited the moment when Protestantism, which unconsciously had prepared the way for them, would have finished beating down the buttresses of the temple, that they might then hurl themselves against the noble edifice with sap and hammer.

Being revolutionaries of a special kind, they did not oppose the civil power to any great extent, first because they saw in royal absolutism a fair realization of their ideal of pagan politics, also because they were not eager for martyrdom. The spirit of free thought did not yield to the movement of the Catholic Restoration which marked so brilliantly the opening annals of the seventeenth century; but flowed beneath as an undercurrent and finally reappeared to be denounced by the thundering voice of Bossuet (*), at the threshold of the eighteenth century. Then it emptied its filthy waters upon a world prepared to receive it. It then made up for its long enforced silence. From Fontenelle, who said that he would not open his hand even were it full of truth, to Bayle who opened wide a hand filled with sophisms and lies, the distance is not perceptible from the viewpoint of chronology but, for him who looks beneath the surface, what a road was travelled between l’Histoire des Oracles, published by Fontenelle in 1687, and the Dictionnaire Philosophique by Bayle, which appeared in 1697! In the former we have still the elegant scepticism of the man of the world, who slips a discreet doubt in a happy phrase, in a good word, in a smile; in the latter we have open and cynical unbelief in all its brutality. As has been aptly remarked, all Voltaire is found in the Dictionnaire Historique. The role of the patriarch of Ferney consisted in popularizing the philosophy of Bayle and in giving it a militant and aggressive character.

(*) Bossuet, Jacques-Bénigne, a celebrated French writer and pulpit orator (1627-1704), was appointed preceptor to the Dauphin for whose benefit he wrote, among other things, the greatest book of the Century of Louis XIV: “Discourse on Universal History.” Later he was appointed Bishop of Meaux. He is the author of numerous spiritual, historical polemical works, and, in the words of St. Simon, “died fighting.” Ferdinand Brunetièrè, the eminent French critic, says: “There is nothing, in French, which surpasses a fine page of Bossuet.”
Licentiousness another cause of Revolution.

Along with unbelief there grew up licentiousness of morals. Bred in high society, where man no longer saw anything in life but a round of pleasure, moral laxity had contaminated the entire court of Valois, and we find shameful traces of it in the well-known physiognomy of the Béarnais. Think of the morals of that society of which Brantôme in the XVI century and Hamilton in the XVII century were the complaisant chroniclers! One is shocked at the cynicism and the frivolity with which men and women rushed headlong in the pursuit of the most unavowable pleasures. So long as Louis XIV lived, the prestige he gave to his reign concealed all these turpitudes under the broad folds of the royal purple, and men showed some decency, some respect of self and of others, even amid the most revolting excesses; but his death gave the signal for an unprecedented loosening of all moral restraint. I should offend my hearers, were I to indicate, even in the most discreet manner, the example set by the Regent and by Louis XV; but it must be said that it was followed very generally and that, with a few honorable exceptions, high society seemed anxious to make all France the home of wickedness. Never had Christian civilization witnessed so shameful a spectacle.
Unbelief and licentiousness fostered by Voltaire.

The two currents above mentioned had more than once mixed their muddy waters during the long years which preceded the advent of Voltaire; with him they became finally but the one current which was about to flood France. It was at the Hotel of the Temple, among the leaders of vice and impiety who then held their headquarters there, that the sinister pontiff of modern irreligion grew up. This friend of the libertines of high society was also on good terms with the notorious Ninon de Lenclos, who bequeathed to him two thousand francs for the purchase of books. It affords some satisfaction to know that the greatest enemy of the Christian faith should have been the protégé of a courtesan. For my part, when I consider that the "philosophy" comes to us from the boudoir of Ninon, I feel as did Tertullian who congratulated himself on the fact that the first persecutor of Christianity was Nero.

Voltaire was the most complete incarnation of the irreverent spirit of the eighteenth century. To the French corruption and frivolity he added the hateful fanaticism which he imbibed, while in England, from the deists of that country. After his return he was perhaps the most marvelous workman of destruction who has ever appeared. He was endowed with a mind unequalled in suppleness and vivacity, universally gifted as a writer, skilled in the infernal art of handling the poisonous weapon of sarcasm and irony; and, in the war to death which he had declared against Christianity, he employed all the resources of a mind exceptionally constituted for intellectual struggles and all the indefatigable activities of a satanic hatred against the Church. For almost a century, he led the irreligious campaign with astounding obstinacy and—to use the expression of a great modern poet—he was the missionary of the devil among the men of his time. He is little read nowadays, because, notwithstanding his prodigious talent, his works were of his day; nevertheless his mind remains the evil genius of the modern world, and, to the present day, the Christian cannot look upon his hideous likeness without feelings of fright and horror.

Gathered about Voltaire were all the defenders of impiety, or "philosophy," as they were pleased then to designate it. From this crowd came forth the Encyclopédie, a formidable engine of war which, under the pretext of presenting to the public a summary of modern knowledge, carried to all classes hatred and contempt of Christianity. Ecrasez l'infâme! (Crush the infamous thing!) was the watchword of the master; the disciples often outstripped their master. They found him bigoted, for they were atheists, while Voltaire honored God by believing in Him.
Banded together as organized leaders of public opinion, surrounded by the prestige of science, and winning fresh popularity from the mild opposition of the civil power, the Encyclopedists were able to undermine with impunity all religious belief, all the foundations of moral and social life. They succeeded, moreover, in enlist ing the co-operation of the civil power in their work. Revolutionaries in religious matters, they were, at least apparently, conservatives in politics. Bold against God alone, they knew how to spare the despots, how to glorify them when necessary. Were not the kings who hated religion the best of kings? This is why Voltaire cringed before Frederick II (1), before Catherine II (2), even before Madame de Pompadour, the notorious mistress of King Louis XV, indifferent as he was to everything save his combat against the faith of Jesus Christ. Provided he were given control of religion, nothing else concerned him, as he realized, no doubt, that this was all he needed. It would appear that at times, in the midst of his work of death, he caught a glimpse of what was to

---

(1) Frederick II, "The Great," King of Prussia, which country he raised to the rank of a great power. (1740-1788). He early became a free-thinker. He praised the literature of France and despised that of Germany. He was an intimate friend of Voltaire.

(2) Catherine II (1729-1796), empress of Russia, extended the limits of the Russian empire by victories over the Turks, secularized the property of the clergy, became famous as a writer, and corresponded with the French Encyclopedists.
happen: "After me, they will see a fine racket," he wrote. This, however, was but a flash, and he went back at once to his accursed work.

Seductive theories of Rousseau impelling factor.

But if Voltaire did not draw political conclusions because he was too much in love with his own ease and because, in the main, he was still imbued with the ancient regime, there was one who was willing to draw these conclusions for him. This one, unlike the great lord who wished to die quietly in his beautiful solitude at Ferney, was a soured plebeian, ill-bred, suspicious, a misanthrope to a degree. Possessing the soul of a poet and the heart of a footman, Jean Jacques Rousseau hated and despised the society in which he lived, the civilization which surrounded him, all society and all civilization. He had all that was needed to make his revolutionary passions penetrate into the hearts of others: captivating warmth of expression, genuine sensibility, sincere emotion, enthusiasm for the good and the beautiful, or for what he believed to be such. He introduced a new strain into French literature. To the artificial society of the salons, he, the savage who had slept under the open sky, revealed the charms of nature; he gave a taste for the beauties of the landscape to the great lords who had never seen one except through the windows of their castles; at his voice, the entire court rose to go with Queen Marie Antoinette to contemplate the early dawn. Even Voltaire had his hour of infatuation!

Nevertheless, these are not the real triumphs of Jean Jacques. He had made far different discoveries in his musings as a lone walker. He had discovered that man is good when he comes from the hand of nature but becomes corrupted when he lives in the state of society. This is a heresy with an added sophism, because it denies original sin, and what is society but man? He had discovered that all the arts of civilization, and particularly science and literature, serve but to increase corruption. He had discovered that society is the result of a contract between its members and that the source of law is their will, which may express itself whenever it pleases. Away with religion, with morality, with tradition! The people are the only sovereign, and any institution, any law, any will opposed to the people is tyranny, usurpation, and high treason.

These were the political theories of Rousseau (*) which his eloquence and enthusiasm succeeded in fastening upon the minds of his contemporaries. A society which had been taught to scoff at the religious law and to believe in nothing was to accept with enthusiasm such seductive theories: accordingly the doctrine of the Contrat Social became in a short time the doctrine of the cultured public. The disciples of Rousseau were legion, chiefly among the classes whom the sarcasms of Voltaire had turned away from religion and who, having ceased to believe in the Christian ideal, could not do without some kind of ideal and thought they had found it in the dreamings of the sophist of Geneva.

(*) Rousseau Jean Jacques born at Geneva, June 28, 1712; died near Paris, July 2, 1778. His book, "Contrat Social," has been styled "the Koran of the Revolutionists."

But is it really true that the alliance between free thought and voluptuousness is sufficient to bring forth the revolutionary spirit? Is it not true that elsewhere—as in England—the ruling classes had displayed, with no less cynicism than in France, their contempt for the Christian faith and the moral law? Still England did not cease to be the most conservative nation in the world. This is true, and it would be interesting to follow closely the energetic reaction whereby the English people rid themselves of their own philosophers in order to come back to Christian tradition. But, without taking into account the fact that the evil was more deeply rooted in France, one must not forget that France is the land where all ideas tend to be at once translated into facts: in France less than elsewhere do people tolerate the contradiction between the ideal and the reality. And the French cultured classes had their ideal of poitical society, which had been elaborated by the Renaissance and perfected by the philosophy of the eighteenth century. This ideal, borrowed from ancient literature and adapted to modern society, was a dream of the imagination, an abstract conception evolved from pure reason; nothing seemed more urgent or more easy than the realization of this ideal. All that seemed necessary was to put it into effect by law and thus bring down to earth liberty, civic virtue, reason, philosophy and universal felicity.

Thus they thought. They were far removed from that faith in religion and in country which had caused Jean Racine (*) to write that truly Gallican sentence: “God has given me the grace never to be ashamed either of my king or of the Gospel.” On the contrary, they were convinced that religion and monarchy or, as they expressed it, fanaticism and despotism caused all the evils of humanity. They thought that humanity, duped by priests and crushed by tyrants, would rise to the height of its glorious mission only when it would rid itself of priest and tyrant and give ear only to the teachings of philosophy. We have already spoken of the enthusiastic hope with which the sensible heart of the philosophers and their disciples looked forward to the glad day. We must add that all obstacles to the realization of their golden dream, all reaction against the generous efforts they made for the public welfare enraged these gentle and humane mortals. They considered every opposition a monstrous attempt against human liberty; and there was no punishment which, in their anger, they did not dream of inflicting on the criminal author. For their "philosophy" was a religion; and if it did not send its heretics to the funeral-pile, because of their horror of the Inquisition, it found other means of chastisement for contemners of its orthodoxy. By way of anticipation, we may say that this is all that the Revolution really discovered.

(*) Jean Racine, the most celebrated French tragic poet, born December 21, 1639; died at Paris, April 26, 1699. His master piece is "Athalie," a scriptural tragedy.

Philosophers put theories into practice—Revolution accomplished.

It is true that the philosophers and their pupils were not the nation. But they were its moving and active spirit, and, as is always the case, it was easy to have others mistake them for the nation. They were loud of speech; though without authority, they spoke in the name of the people and made themselves heard more and more every day; they kept telling the people, as Siéyès expressed it, that they had been nothing and that they were to be everything. And scarcely had the States-General reassembled when the philosophers took possession of the assembly in the name of the nation, and pretended that the other orders had no right and that the king was merely their mandatory. Louis XVI had imprudently taken the stand that the States-General should vote by Orders, whilst the Third Estate wished that they should cast individual votes. At once it was evident that the will of the Third Estate placed itself above the will of the king. When the master of ceremonies enjoined the Third Estate to go to their own assembly hall and leave that of the general meeting, President Bailly replied: "I hold that the assembled nation cannot be commanded." This saying, more authentic than the one attributed to Mirabeau, is also much more expressive: the one, on the lips of the tribune, was the unauthorized whim of a factionist; the other, in the mouth of the President of the Third Estate, modest in its form but haughty in meaning, expressed the usurpation of all power by the people.

The Revolution was accomplished. The events which followed were but the logical development of this opening. And, if thirst for blood and love of noise were not an integral part of the revolutionary spirit, then it would be on June 23, 1789, and not on July 14, that the leaders of the France of today should celebrate the anniversary of their emancipation.

Thus was the ancient regime delivered entirely into the hands of the States-General. They did with it as they pleased and left to the king only the doubtful privilege of endorsing their work, under the penalty of new riots. The "philosophers" were the masters of France. At last reason was to reign.

Poor showing of lawmakers.

But reason was to make a poor showing and the lawmakers were destined to fall far short of their task. As a whole, they formed a body singularly inexperienced and awkward, and at the same time presumptuous, in face of the gigantic task undertaken. Away from politics for centuries, the States-General did not know how to conduct associations of men. They were reformers in theory; they believed that the welfare of humanity could be enacted by laws, and they naïvely legislated patriotism and national happiness. As already stated, most of them were filled with classical recollections and impressed with the idea of the republican virtues which, in their student days, they had admired in the heroes of antiquity. They recalled these memories and enacted laws like college boys. Is there anything in the whole history of civilization more grotesque and at the same time more pitiable than the action of Hérault de Séchelles, President of the Convention, who, when they were about to draw up one of the many constitutions which the Revolutionaries gave to France, sent to the National Library for the laws of Minos(*), in order to transcribe from them the laws he intended to give his country?

No wonder that the force of events, the laws of history, the laws of common sense should work havoc with the theses of Rousseau. Scarcely had the States-General informed the king that the people were the only sovereign, when there arose from the crowd a thousand threatening voices repeating to them what they had said to the king: "We are the sovereign people and you are but our mandatories!"

Revolutionary leaders overthrown.

And who spoke thus? Was it really the people of France? Not at all! The people were at their firesides, in the shops, behind the plow, engaged in fruitful and civilizing work; they had recorded their wishes in the election of 1789 and, whenever they were given an opportunity to express their will, they disavowed the intriguers and the malefactors who presumed to speak in their name. But what did these care? There being no longer any master in France—since on the fourteenth of July and the fifth of October, 1789, they had put aside the royal authority—they felt that they were the true masters of their country. They were organized, they knew what they wanted, they had under their thumb the king and the States-General against whom they could at pleasure incite well-planned riots; at one stroke they made June 20, August 10, May 31, the great revolutionary dates. It was in the clubs that they worked out the popular movements. In these clubs the most fanatical and the most unscrupulous were in control, and, in last analysis, two or three men—and these the worst of their kind—were the real sovereign people.

(*) Minos, ancient king of Crete, and lawgiver of that island.

Taine, the well-known French critic and historian, in characterizing the triumvirate which controlled the destinies of France, has said that it was composed of a madman—Marat (1), of a savage—Danton (2), and of a pedant—Robespierre. These are the true sons of Voltaire and of Rousseau. Robespierre took the Contrat Social as his gospel; he had no other political education. With a handful of accomplices, these wretches went to work with no other aim, with no other ideal than to beat down all that stood in their way;

---

(1) Marat, born in Switzerland in 1744, assassinated at Paris in 1793, by Charlotte Corday. He was a leader of the Commune. He had two leading ideas which the committee of Public Safety subsequently realized—extermination of mass of the enemies of the Revolution and the appointment of a dictator, whose functions should be limited to proscribing.

(2) Danton, George-Jacques, born October 28, 1759; guillotined at Paris, April 5, 1794. He was an orator of great power, a leader of the attack of the Tuileries, was implicated in the "September massacres." He overthrew Hebert and his party with the aid of Robespierre and was in turn overthrown by the latter.
everything fell before them: first, the kings, nobles and priests, then all others who did not share their revolutionary ideal, all who were moderantist, as they put it in their jargon, the Feuillants (1), the Girondists (2), until having leveled all else—they set out to destroy one another. The Jacobins (3), cut the throats of the Cordeliers (4) the Thermidorians (5) cut the throats of the Jacobins, the Directory (6) deported the rest. Finally there came a dictator who, amid the plaudits of France, drove out the whole menagerie at the crack of the whip, and re-established for his own benefit the much despised despotism. The last revolu-

(1) Feuillants, a political faction of the Revolution which received its name from the convent of the Feuillants where it held its first meetings.

(2) Girondists, an important political party during the French Revolution. Their original leaders came from department of Gironde, hence their name. They were moderate Republicans, were the ruling party in 1792, were overthrown in the convention 1793.

(3) Jacobins, members of a society of French revolutionists organized in 1789, and called Jacobins from the Jacobin convent in Paris where they met. The more violent members speedily gained the control of the organization, supported Robespierre and brought on the "Reign of Terror."

(4) Cordeliers, a political club which took its name from its meeting place in the Convent of the Cordeliers. Its first political move was to demand the deposition of the king and the establishment of a republic, on June 20, 1791. It was extinguished with the "Reign of Terror" in 1794. Danton was its political chief.

(5) Thermidorians, the more moderate party of the French Revolution, who took part in or sympathized with the overthrow of Robespierre and his adherents on the 9th of Thermidor, year II. (July 27, 1794).

(6) The Directory, a body of five men who held the executive power in France from November 1, 1795, to the Coup d'état of 1799, November 9. The Directory was overthrown by Napoleon, and succeeded by the Consulate.
tionaries became his footmen and his courtiers; he gave them golden liveries with which they were well pleased and one of them, having become a prince of the Empire, said to his old comrades of the Montagne (1): "In public, be sure to call me Your Excellency, but among ourselves call me simply Monseigneur." (2)

This is amusing, no doubt, and the enemies of the Revolution may find amusement at seeing the tragedy end in a farce. But what is more serious is the fact that, before making honorable amends in the ante-chambers of the new Caesar, the revolutionary spirit had time to invade all Europe and to spread everywhere the evil germ from which we suffer to the present day. The evil of the Revolution is the pretension to treat political society as if it were the creation of pure reason, independent of the action of the divine laws which rule the life of the world and of humanity!

This, in a few words, is the origin of the French Revolution. Long before its realization it was in the minds and the hearts of men; its success was brought about by the abdication or complicity of all the forces which should have opposed it. It was the

(1) Montagne (The Mountain). Name given to the extreme Revolutionary party in the legislatures of the first French Revolution. The name was derived from the fact that they occupied the higher part of the hall. Among the chief Montagnards were Robespierre and Danton.

(2) This anecdote is told of Cambacérès by Baron, Mosaique Belge, 1887, p. 183.
breaking out of the malady at once intellectual and moral which for a long time had been working on the nation, coming down from the ruling classes to the rank and file of the citizens where it was transformed into a political catastrophe.

Revolution could have been avoided.

Could this catastrophe have been avoided? Unhesitatingly I answer yes, and I add that it would have been avoided if the Catholic Church had been there. But the Church was not there to help France. The Church, from the time of the XIV century, had been excluded from the political councils; it had been looked upon by the kings as a stranger—even as a rival; it had been enslaved to the point of having to sacrifice the Society of Jesus to the importunities of Freemasonry; () it () When Clement XIV ascended the throne of Peter, France, Spain and Portugal had suppressed the Society of Jesus de facto; the accession of a new Pope was made the occasion for insisting on the abolition of the Order, root and branch, de facto et de jure, in Europe and all over the world. This persecution was inspired in Latin countries by French irreligious philosophism, by Jansenism, Gallicanism and Erastianism. An ever-recurring and almost solitary grievance against the Society was the Fathers disturbed the peace wherever they were firmly established. The accusation was not unfounded; the Jesuits did, and to the present day do, disturb the peace of the enemies of the Church.

In 1772 the Spanish ambassador threatened the Pope with a schism in Spain and probably in other Latin countries, such as had existed in Portugal from 1760 to 1770. This contemptible threat broke the backbone of the opposition of Clement XIV who, the following June, signed the brief of suppression to restore the peace of the Church by removing one of the contending parties from the battlefield. No blame was laid by the Pope on the rules of the Order, or the personal conduct of the members, or the orthodoxy of their teaching. had been deprived of its rights so that it was no longer allowed to teach the doctrine of the infallibility of the Sovereign Pontiff; it had been watched and tracked even in its liturgy; so that the Church in France was nothing more than one of the wheels put in motion by the despotism of the State. The Gallican Church had permitted the lay power to impose upon it the doctrine of the four articles, which was a bold encroachment of the State upon an exclusively doctrinal domain. She received at the hands of the king dogmas which she rejected from the hand of the Pope. It was of no benefit to her that she formed a privileged Order; this condition, favorable on the surface, was an incessant source of loss and unpopularity. Associated, as she was, with the destinies of the civil power, she became conjointly liable and public opinion held her responsible for all the mistakes of the regime of which she was a part. She was out of contact with the public spirit, had at her disposal no lever to move the minds of men, and was without influence in the world of ideas.

It was unfortunate that all dignitaries of the Church were chosen exclusively from the nobility, at a time when the nobility had fallen into general disfavor. At one time—the time of Louis XIV—there had been in the ranks of the higher clergy some children of the bourgeoisie who did not cut so bad a figure on episcopal thrones—one of these was Bossuet. But when the revolution burst forth, among the hundred and thirty bishops of the kingdom of France, there was not one plebeian! Taken as a whole, the episcopate was commendable in private life and was not wanting in good qualities; but what a gulf between it and the nation, what a source of misunderstanding! The higher clergy—noble, attached to the court, absentee, worldly, almost laicized—did not rise to the occasion; they had neither the prestige of learning, nor the eclat of great virtue, nor the advantage of real popularity: they were not the kind to guide the Church through the tempests.

Nor were the inferior clergy more abreast of the times. True, they gave the example of Christian virtue, and stood intact in a gangrened society. Tocqueville gives this magnificent testimonial: "I began the study of the ancient society filled with prejudices against it, I finished it filled with respect." Other witnesses speak in the same manner and everyone knows the heroism of the French clergy in weathering the stormy days of the Revolution. But, if they were well preserved from a moral point of view, they no longer had the true notion of the full part they were to play in society. They languished in a general state of dejection, they were resigned to be nothing, they did not protest when they saw the Church humiliated. As a keen observer has remarked *, they lacked intellectual courage and were, in a word, more ready for martyrdom than for the apostolate. And what is still worse, a great many of them, ignorant of the beauty of the social doctrine of Catholicism, allowed themselves to be won over by the doctrine of Rousseau; and they applauded, as if these were discoveries made by the philosophers, the few particles of truth which were really Catholic doctrine. To such an extent had the social and political traditions been obliterated even among the clergy! I know of nothing so painful as the illusion of those pastors who—the guardians of a treasure—allow counterfeit money to be substituted for the genuine coin!

Thus, the most heartrending spectacle of that whole century was not the deafening cries of error and crime but the silence of the Catholic Church concerning social truth. All lying doctrines were heard—but the Church of God was dumb. Her voice was the only one which did not rise in the din of discordant voices which characterizes the eighteenth century as noisy and strange. The century listened in vain for a teacher endowed with authority and eloquence to propound the luminous and sound teachings of the Catholic faith on the nature of society, on the mission of the State and of the civic powers. These lofty ideas were the only ones without defenders, but there was no sophism which did not find as advocate some man of talent or of genius.

---

Do we appreciate what would have happened if, during the ages which saw the apogee of the monarchy, there had arisen bishops, priests and laymen to proclaim the eternal social principles of Christianity—who, going beyond the Renaissance to the great doctors of the Middle Ages, would have taught an astonished world that there is such a thing as Christian politics not to be confounded with the politics of royal absolutism but which contains at once the eternal truths and their applications, nova et vetera? Do we realize what would have happened if, like Fénélon in his Plan de Gouvernement written for the Duke of Burgundy, they had protested against the enslavement of the Church, demanded for her freedom as in Turkey (*), preached the suppression of the unbridled luxury of the court, branded all abuses and sought means to remedy the evils of society? May we not believe that they would have been heeded? Would not the destinies of the world have been changed if, when the problem of social re-organization arose, there had been found an episcopate to recall to the world that the solution of the problem should be sought in the Gospel and in Catholic doctrine, instead of seeking it in l’Esprit des Lois (*) and in the Contrat Social? If the Church had spoken with her authority in all questions where the welfare of humanity was at stake, what light would she not have shed on the darkness of the controversies touching the mission of the State and of society? Think of the resources the Church would have brought to all the generous and sincere leaders who, at the beginning of the Revolution, dreamed of a free and rejuvenated France under the aegis of religion and under the authority of the king! The nation would have had its political creed to oppose to the innovators, and the divorce which the sophists succeeded in bringing about between religion and the friends of liberty would have had no reason to exist. The espousal by the men of those days of the false maxims of the Revolution was possible only because of the silence of the gagged and powerless Church; it would have been prevented by churchmen conscious of their mission and enjoying the fullness of freedom.

(*) "The Great Turk leaves the Christians free to elect and depose their pastors. If the Church in France were in the same condition, we should have the liberty, we do not now possess, of electing, deposing and assembling our pastors." (Œuvres de Fénélon, ed F. Didot, 1861, t. III, p. 432.)

(*) Esprit des Lois (The Spirit of Laws) written by Montesquieu 1748, 14 years before the Contrat Social of Rousseau. Its political influence was worldwide. But on various points he seriously misunderstood Catholic teaching, and the Sorbonne drew up a list of passages from his writings that seemed to call for censure (August 1752).
Since then, if I may use the expression, the Catholic Church has once more become her- self. One might have thought that she slept at the time of the Revolution; but it was the sleep of Jesus in the bark shaken by the tem- pest. Her awakening, tardy though it may seem, has been all the more fruitful. A great intellectual and social movement is already under way in the ranks of the Church: it is the beginning of the great struggle, the greatest of all her struggles against the pow- ers of darkness.

Let us not make the same mistake and be deceived by appearances. Our own atmos- phere is not less charged than was that of the Revolution. I dare say that even the Revolu- tion was not preceded by symptoms as formi- dable as those which now, under our eyes, seem to foreshadow a new catastrophe. In our day, we would not smile at the prediction of another Cazotte tracing, as he did at the end of the eighteenth century, a dark and hopeless picture of the future.

New awakening of Christian society.

But, let us not forget that the condition of the Christian world has been greatly changed in the course of a century. Then the revolu- tionary spirit was young, bubbling with life; its hands were filled with promises of endless happiness; it was master of the earth; all humanity welcomed it; the forces of social conservation surrendered to it. But to-day it is old and decrepit; its prevarication is as clear as the light of day; condemned by all thinking men, it is no longer anything but a superstition believed in only by mediocre minds. At that time the Catholic Church, mutilated and enslaved, was a captive whom the catastrophe found prostrate at the foot of the throne, awaiting her turn to mount the scaffold. To-day, freed and herself again, she rises a giant and faces Revolution, not only to defend the domains which still are hers but also to recover those of which she has been despoiled. She has shattered all the maxims of philosophism. She has recalled to life the Society of Jesus whose suppression had been forced on her (*). She has proclaimed the infallibility of her head. In 1832 and in 1864, she condemned the false doctrine of 1789. Finally, building again on the ruins of the city of lies, she has proclaimed in immortal encyclicals the Christian Constitution of States and the Magna Charta of the emancipation of labor.

Who will deny that to-day, as in the Middle Ages, the Catholic Church is the highest authority? She speaks to all humanity in an accent sweet and strong and all her own. And she alone can talk to mankind. Amid the universal crash of thrones and schools and doctrines, she is the one moral force which remains standing and her astonishing superiority is enhanced by the very depth of their fall.

(*) The Society of Jesus was restored by Pius VII, August 7, 1814, by the Bull "Solicitudo Omnium Ecclesiarum."
She has but to raise her voice and from all parts of the universe she is answered. To-day there is such a thing as Catholic thought, which measures all things by the rule of Christian truth, condemning what is opposed to it, accepting what is not hostile. Strong and respected, conscious of its power, it circulates from one end of the world to the other;
no longer can any sophism withstand it. In sociology, in science, in art, in all manifestations of the intellectual and moral life of the people, Catholic thought asserts itself with increasing force and energy. It is not refuted because it is irrefutable; it is opposed only by the conspiracy of silence.

Nor is this all. Descending from the field of doctrine to that of action, the Catholic spirit has taken possession of public life. The Catholic battalions are re-organized; on every side, an army of laymen is rising. The people come to uphold their clergy; the rank and file of the faithful insist on sharing the struggle.
How cheering it is, in time of trouble, to see the recruits rally about their banner! The work is indeed long and tedious, but nothing can prevent its accomplishment! It is going on in different countries—in Belgium, in Holland, in Catholic Germany, in Northern Italy; in other countries persecution must act as a spur to the tardy ones. And he would be blind indeed who would fail to see in the fury and stubbornness of persecutors the expiring effort of iniquity!

The triumph of the Catholic cause is secure, even from a human point of view. Today, as at all critical stages of her growth, she has displayed the same marvelous adaptability. Detaching her cause from that of any class that might seek to identify itself with her, she has answered them as she answered the Jews, as she answered Feudalism, as she answered all the ghosts of the past. She lets the dead bury their dead and enters into compact with the twentieth century. She lays out a course for the rising masses. It is not the course of the Revolution—as her slanderers say—it is the program of the Gospel, the program of St. Thomas of Aquin (*). It is the welcoming of all by the Kingdom of God, disregarding birth and wealth, considering only merit and virtue; it is the democracy of the Gospel built upon the poor, and where we see realized the law of justice and fraternity in an ever widening application of the great New Commandment.

She opposes to the bloody and sinister ideals of the red flag and the cap of the convict her incomparable ideal of the love of God and the love of man, with its symbol of the Cross. Despite all contrary appearances we need not doubt of her final triumph. The human soul is naturally Christian; everything great and good gravitates towards the Gospel. Human society is drawn instinctively in the direction of Jesus Christ whenever it obeys the laws of self-preservation. The spirit of evil may do its worst, it will but precipitate events and hasten the day when humanity will have choice only between Catholic civilization and revolutionary anarchy. And then the choice will soon be made.

(*) How the principles of St. Thomas furnish a remedy for the evils affecting modern society is explained in the great encyclicals of Leo XIII on the Christian constitution of states, human liberty, the chief duties of Christians as citizens, and the condition of the working classes.

Let us then greet with hope and respect the progress that is going on at this moment in Christian society. It is a new Catholic springtime. We have seen other spectacles of the kind in our study of the Church in the past. They must help us to appreciate what is now going on under our eyes, affording, as they do, a new proof of the indefectible vitality of the Church. We would indeed be blind to the teachings of history were we, at this stage of her life, to forget that now, as in the past, she is upholding not the interests of a class but the cause of humanity.
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Index Entry</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Abraham</td>
<td>28, 41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Academus</td>
<td>139</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aeneid</td>
<td>95</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aetius</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Adolph of Nassau</td>
<td>109</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Adrian of Corneto</td>
<td>148</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Africa</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aleandro</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Albert the Great</td>
<td>125</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Albigenses</td>
<td>68, 70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Albignesian</td>
<td>68, 70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alexander</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alexander II</td>
<td>74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alexander III</td>
<td>116</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alexander VI</td>
<td>144</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alexander Hegius</td>
<td>131</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alexandria</td>
<td>148</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alfred the Great</td>
<td>69</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Alps</td>
<td>47, 90</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Amiens</td>
<td>136</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anagni</td>
<td>117</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Angelo, St.</td>
<td>89</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anglo-Saxon</td>
<td>53, 55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Antioch</td>
<td>38, 39, 40, 153</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Anselm of Lucca</td>
<td>74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Antwerp</td>
<td>71</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arezzo</td>
<td>146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arles, St.</td>
<td>82</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arian</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Aristotle</td>
<td>95, 130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Armenians</td>
<td>53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Arras</td>
<td>70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Asia</td>
<td>70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Asiatic people</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Assembly of the Notables</td>
<td>163</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ataulf</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Athens</td>
<td>153</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Augustine, St.</td>
<td>54</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Avitus, St.</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Babylon</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bagdad</td>
<td>153</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bailly</td>
<td>176</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Balliet</td>
<td>118</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barbarians</td>
<td>22, 55, 59</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Barnabas</td>
<td>40</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bavaria</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bayle</td>
<td>166</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Beatrice</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Belgium</td>
<td>137, 190</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Index Entry</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Benedict XV</td>
<td>80, 123</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Benedict Cæcilian</td>
<td>109</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bernard Saisset</td>
<td>114, 115</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bohème</td>
<td>134, 135, 137</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bologna</td>
<td>96</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Boniface, St.</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bossuet</td>
<td>166, 184</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Boniface, VIII</td>
<td>89, 104, 108, 109, 110, 112, 117</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>BouthIRC</td>
<td>119</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Brabant</td>
<td>105</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bramante</td>
<td>152, 157, 158</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Brantôme</td>
<td>167</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Britain, Isle of</td>
<td>45, 53</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Brogni</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Brothers of the Penitent</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Bruno</td>
<td>78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Burgundy</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Index Entry</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Caesar</td>
<td>45, 100, 181</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cæsarism</td>
<td>100, 102, 103</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cæsar Borgia</td>
<td>144, 145</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Caesarea</td>
<td>35, 37, 38</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Caligula</td>
<td>99</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Calvin</td>
<td>140</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Camaldolense</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Caracalla</td>
<td>98, 99</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Carolingian</td>
<td>129</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Castile</td>
<td>85</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cathari</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Catherine, II</td>
<td>170</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Catholicism</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Catholic Restor.</td>
<td>165</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cazotte</td>
<td>160, 188</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Celtic</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Châlon</td>
<td>70</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chanson de Roland</td>
<td>135</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Charlemagne</td>
<td>58, 93, 124</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Charles V.</td>
<td>145</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chateaubriand</td>
<td>138</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Chrestus</td>
<td>35</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Christian Constitutions of States</td>
<td>189</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Christian Republic</td>
<td>120</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Christopher Columbus</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Clement, II.</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cleynaerts</td>
<td>132</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Clovis</td>
<td>56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cluny</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Colchis</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Coliseum</td>
<td>98</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Commodus</td>
<td>99</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Congo</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Constantine Emperor</td>
<td>44, 56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Constantinople</td>
<td>121</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Constituent Assembly</td>
<td>161</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Contrat Social</td>
<td>173, 179, 187</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Convention</td>
<td>177</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cordellers</td>
<td>180</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cordova</td>
<td>153</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Cornelius</td>
<td>35, 56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Council of Jerusalem</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Corpus Juris Civilis</td>
<td>96, 88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Crescent</td>
<td>120</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Crusader</td>
<td>.84, 120, 125</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

D

| Damascus                        | 120   |
| Damasus II                      | 75    |
| Daniel                          | 46    |
| Dante Alighieri                 | 117, 130 |
| Danton                          | 179   |
| Danube                          | 45    |
| David                           | 29    |
| DeRoo, Rev. P.                  | 144   |
| Desider of All Nations          | 29    |
| Dictionnaire Historique         | 166   |
| Dictionnaire Philosopique       | 166   |
| Directory                       | 180   |
| Domitian                        | 99    |
| Don Quixote                     | 95    |
| Dupuy                           | 118   |

E

| East Indies                     | 126   |
| Edward I                        | 105, 110 |
| Encyclopede                      | 169   |
| England                         | 109, 168, 173 |
| English Episcopallans           | 32    |
| Enguerrand of Marigny           | 103   |
| Epaminondas                     | 141, 142 |
| Erasmus                         | 143   |
| Emlambado                       | 88    |
| Esprit des Lois                 | 181   |
| Euphrates                        | 45   |
| Europe                          | 108, 112 |
| Europe                          | .61, 73, 88, 90, 103, 107, 108, 112 |

F

| Feast of the Federation        | 161   |
| Femmes Savantes                | 143   |
| Fenelon                         | 136, 186 |
| Ferney                          | 166, 171 |
| Ferreri                         | 138   |
| Feuillants                      | 180   |
| Flanders                        | 105, 114 |
| Florence                        | 96, 149 |
| Fisher Cerdinal                 | 131   |
| Fiolette Peter                  | 103   |
| France                          | 32, 70, 93, 103, 109, 159, 163, 164, Etc. |
| Frederic, II                    | 102, 145, 170 |
| Fontenelle                      | 166   |
| Frederic Barbarossa             | 102   |
| Frederic of Suabia              | 119   |
| Freemasonry                     | 182   |

G

| Galileans                       | 45    |
| Gallic                          | 52, 55 |
| Geneva                          | 149, 170 |
| Genghis Khan                    | 50    |
| Gentile                         | 37, 39 |
| German Lutherans                | 32    |
| Genius of Christianity          | 135   |
| Germanic Nations                | 56, 100 |
| Germany                         | 47, 62, 75, 101, 190 |
| Giotto                          | 189   |
| Girondists                      | 180   |
| Goddess of Reason               | 159   |
| Greek                           | 33, 133 |
| Gregorian                       | 74    |
| Gregory The Great, St.          | 55    |
| Gregory VII                     | .74, 81, 82, 83, 84, 107 |
| Guy of Dampierre                | 110, 114, 116, 118 |
| Gutenberg                       | 126, 127 |

H

| Heliogabalus                    | 99    |
| Hamilton                        | 167   |
| Hebrews                         | 42    |
| Henry III                       | 75, 78 |
| Henry IV                        | 82    |
| Henry V                         | 83    |
| Héraldus de Sichelles            | 177   |
| Hildebrand                      | 81    |
<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Page</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Histoire des Oracles</td>
<td>166</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Hohenstaufen</td>
<td>101</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Holland</td>
<td>190</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Holy Land</td>
<td>104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Huns</td>
<td>49</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>I</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Imitation</td>
<td>142</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Inquisition</td>
<td>175</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Innocent III.</td>
<td>116</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Isabella of Dampierre</td>
<td>110</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Islam</td>
<td>87, 121</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Israel</td>
<td>27, 28, 39, 56</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Italians</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Italy</td>
<td>102, 190</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>J</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jacob</td>
<td>29, 42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jacobins</td>
<td>180</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>James, St., The Just</td>
<td>41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>James, St., The Less</td>
<td>34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jean Jacques Rousseau</td>
<td>171, 172, 173, 179, 185</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jerome Savonarola</td>
<td>149</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jerusalem</td>
<td>29, 40, 42, 120, 121, 153</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Jews</td>
<td>28, Etc.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Joan of Arc</td>
<td>84, 88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John St., of Acre</td>
<td>104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John, St., Lateran</td>
<td>89</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>John Gualbert, St.</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Joppe</td>
<td>35, 40, 42</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Judaism</td>
<td>34, 41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Justinian</td>
<td>90</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Julius II.</td>
<td>152, 157, 158</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>K</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Koran</td>
<td>148</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Knights Templars</td>
<td>112</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>L</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>La Harpe</td>
<td>159</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lavigerie</td>
<td>88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lay Investiture</td>
<td>63</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Legnano</td>
<td>102</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leibnitz</td>
<td>88</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leo Taxil</td>
<td>146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leo IX.</td>
<td>78</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leo X.</td>
<td>136, 152</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leo XIII.</td>
<td>171</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leuctra</td>
<td>141</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Liège</td>
<td>70, 74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Litté</td>
<td>135</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lombard</td>
<td>102</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lorenza della Valle</td>
<td>146</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Lorraine</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Louis IX (St.)</td>
<td>103, 119</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Louis XIV.</td>
<td>167, 170</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Louis XV.</td>
<td>167, 170</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Louis XVI</td>
<td>165, 176</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Louis Vives</td>
<td>132</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>M</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Machiavelli Nicholas</td>
<td>145</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maffei, Father</td>
<td>136</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maffeo Veggio</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manicheism</td>
<td>70, 84</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mantinea</td>
<td>141</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marat</td>
<td>179</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Marie Antoinette</td>
<td>172</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mathilda of Tuscany</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mediterranea</td>
<td>121</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Maximinus</td>
<td>47</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Messias</td>
<td>28, 29, 41</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Metz</td>
<td>145</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Michelangelo</td>
<td>152</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Middle Ages</td>
<td>59, 88, 92, 94, 97, 100, 102, 106, 120, 123, 127, 134, 135, 186</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Milan</td>
<td>44, 82</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Minnesingers</td>
<td>134</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mirabeau</td>
<td>176</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mohammed</td>
<td>121</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mohammedans</td>
<td>104</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Minos</td>
<td>178</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Molière</td>
<td>143</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Montagne</td>
<td>181</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Moses</td>
<td>28, 34</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Mussulmans</td>
<td>148</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>N</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>National Library</td>
<td>178</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nero</td>
<td>99, 168</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nibelungenlied</td>
<td>135</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nicholas II</td>
<td>79</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nicholas V</td>
<td>152, 154</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nicolaitanism</td>
<td>75</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nile</td>
<td>45</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nius, St.</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ninon de Lenclos</td>
<td>168</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Nogaret, Wm. of</td>
<td>104, 117</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Index Page</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>------------</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Norica 47</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Notre Dame de Paris 159</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>O</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Occident 96, 127</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Odoacer 47</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Omar Calif. 148</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Orient 51, 127</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Orléans 70</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Otho III. 73</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Palestine 35, 104</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pandects 95</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Paris 136</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pascal 124</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pascal II. 83</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pastor 157</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Paul, St. 40</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Penteceost 29</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peter, St. 27, 35, 38, 43, 92, 154, 158</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peter Damian 80</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Peter's, St. 153, 157</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Philip The Fair 103, 105, 106, 107, 109, 110, 111, 114, 117, 118, 119</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Philosophers 177</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Parthenon 153</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pius II. 152</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Plan de Gouvernement 186</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Plaisians, William of 103</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Poem of the Cld. 135</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pompadour, Madame de 170</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pomponazzi 146</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Portuguese 126</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Proscylytes 30, 31</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Protestants 163, 165</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Porta Nigra 153</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Puritans 149</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Pythagoras 26</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roman 33, 48, 50, 55, 64, 96, 97, 98, 100, 101, 102</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roman Empire 44, 45, 64, 100</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Roman Felicity 21, 22</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rome 35, 46, 49, 53, 54, 89, 115, 153, 154</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Romuald, St. 73</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Rudolph Agricola 130</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Russian Schismatics 32</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sadoletto 130</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Salerno 83</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Savonarola 149, 150</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Scotland 105</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Septimus Severus 47</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Simon the Magician 66</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sion 41</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Sistine Chapel 153</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Society of Jesus 182, 189</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>States General 116, 117, 159, 163, 175, 177, 179</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Stilicho 48</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Suabia 101</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Suetonius 34</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Switzerland 47</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Syria 40</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tacitus 33, 34</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Taine 179</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Temple 168</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tertullian 168</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thebean 142</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Theodoric The Great 49</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thermidorians 180</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Third Estate 178</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thiers 139</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thomas of Aquin 125, 130</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Thomas More 131</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Toqueville 184</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trajan 98</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Treves 153</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Trissotin 143</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Troubadours 134</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Tunis 120</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turkey 186</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Turks 121</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Truce of God 87</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
INDEX—Continued.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Page</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>U</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vida</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vienne</td>
<td>55</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Urban II.</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vincent of Beauvais</td>
<td>125</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Virgil</td>
<td>95, 130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Voltaire</td>
<td>166,</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td></td>
<td>168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 179</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>V</td>
<td></td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vadius</td>
<td>143</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vallombrosa</td>
<td>73</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Valois</td>
<td>167</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vasco da Gama</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vatican</td>
<td>89, 153, 157</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wazon</td>
<td>74</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Versailles</td>
<td>159</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>West Indies</td>
<td>126</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Victor III.</td>
<td>83</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Wilson, President</td>
<td>122</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Vittorino da Feltre</td>
<td>130</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Worms</td>
<td>84</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

First Communion Catechism.

It contains thirty-five questions and answers of the Baltimore Catechism. It explains them to little children by means of the corresponding Bible story and an appropriate picture, etc. It has been adopted for the diocese of Helena.

"The First Communion Catechism of Rt. Rev. Mon- signor Day, V. G., has been approved for the diocese. It will be used in the first and second grades in all our Catholic schools and by all children attending other schools, who have not made their First Communion. Urge parents in remote districts, where Mass is not said every Sunday, to use it in instructing their children in the home. This Catechism will be used as a basis for the First Communion examination and for the examination I personally conduct before Confirmation."—From Pastoral Letter of Rt. Rev. John P. Carroll, D. D., Bishop of Helena.

RT. REV. VICTOR DAY,
Helena, Montana.

An Explanation of the Catechism, Part First—The Apostles’ Creed.

Price: Single Copies, 75 cents
In lots of 12 or more, 60 cents

First Communion Catechism Correspondence Course, 55 cents.

Correspondence Course Apostles’ Creed $1.00 BOOKLIST.

Betten:
The Ancient World.

Betten:
The Modern World.

Stebbing:
The Story of the Catholic Church.

Fouard:
(Several volumes).

Allard:
Ten Lectures on the Martyrs.

Moran:
The Government of the Church In the First Centuries.

Battifol:
Primitive Catholicism.

Rivere:
The Expansion of Christianity In the First Three Centuries.

Montalambert:
The Monks of the West.

Newman: Historical Sketches.

Grisar:
Lives of the Popes.

Mann:
Lives of the Popes.

Pastor:
Lives of the Popes.

Gasquet:
(Several volumes).

Walsh:
The Thirteenth, the Greatest of Centuries.
The Century of Columbus.

Baudrillard:
The Catholic Church, the Renaissance and Protestantism.

Stone: Reformation and Renaissance.

Parsons:
Studies in Church History.

Lilly:
Christianity and Modern Civilization.

Devas:
The Key to the Worlds' Progress.

Fortesque:
The Orthodox Eastern Church.
The Lesser Eastern Churches.

Duchesne:
The Churches Separated From Rome.

Cram:
(Several volumes, especially):
The Great Thousand Years.
The Heart of Europe.
The Substance of Gothic.

Devos:
The Three Ages of Progress.

The books of above list are recommended by Rev. Wm. Busch, professor of history in the Seminary of St. Paul.
WHAT ARE THE MIDDLE AGES?

By

GODFREY KURTH

Authorized Translation from the Seventh French Edition

By

RT. REV. VICTOR DAY

Revised and Annotated Edition, 1924
Third Thousand

Copyright 1921
RT. REV. VICTOR DAY

NAEGELE PRINTING CO., HELENA, MONT.
Nihil Obstat

J. C. WILLGING Censor

Imprimatur

JOANNES P. CARROLL
Episcopus Helenensis
In festo Praesentationis B. M. V. A. D. 1924
GENERAL ANALYTICAL INDEX

The current definition of the Middle Ages implies that they are an intermediary epoch between two civilizations, and, therefore, only a break in the course of civilization .................................................. 5

The current definition of the Middle Ages has created a misconception of that epoch .................................................. 7

Legends and false impressions concerning the Middle Ages .......................................................................................... 9

Refutation of these legends ........................................................................................................................................... 12

The myth of the Soulless Woman .................................................................................................................................. 12

Popess Joan .................................................................................................................................................................. 13

Donation of Constantine.................................................................................................................................................. 13

False Decretals .............................................................................................................................................................. 14

The Right of the Lord ..................................................................................................................................................... 15

The Warm Blood Bath .................................................................................................................................................... 15

The Terrors of the Year One Thousand .......................................................................................................................... 16

Leprosy ........................................................................................................................................................................ 16

No Bath for a Thousand Years......................................................................................................................................... 17

Criticism of the current definition of the term "Middle Ages." The definition is taken from philology and has a meaning entirely different from that contemptuously attributed to it .......................................................................................................................... 18

First uses of the term "Middle Ages" in its present sense ............................................................................................ 23

The Middle Ages are not an intermediary period; they are, on the contrary, the beginning of modern society ......... 24

The Renaissance is an intermediary period in a certain sense ..................................................................................... 28

The Renaissance in all its vital elements was but an efflorescence of the Middle Ages ............................................. 29

The Middle Ages do not present the ideal state of society ............................................................................................ 31

Strictly speaking, there are no "Middle Ages" .................................................................................................................. 33

The real line of demarcation in the history of the world is Golgotha ........................................................................... 33

Vicissitudes and future of Christian civilization ........................................................................................................... 35
WHAT ARE THE MIDDLE AGES?

The current definition of the Middle Ages implies that they are an intermediary epoch between two civilizations, and, therefore, only a break in the course of civilization.

There is no term about the definition of which there is more perfect agreement than "The Middle Ages". We are told that the Middle Ages are an intermediary period between antiquity and modern times. This is the definition given by all dictionaries, encyclopedias, textbooks and summaries. (1) The most erudite writers on medieval history give no other definition. No matter how they differ in their appreciation of the Middle Ages, they all agree in the definition, and with singular unanimity declare that the Middle Ages are an intermediary epoch.

Which are the two periods separated by this break of a thousand years known as the Middle Ages? We are told that they are the two great civilizations of history—the ancient and the modern; the ancient, the Greco-Roman, with its splendid unity of a world pacified beneath the standards of Rome; the modern, with the wonderful variety of its national groups and the untold wealth of its intellectual manifestations—two worlds equally impressive, equally wonderful. They tell us that between these two quite distinct periods there stretches the long span of ten centuries during which the ancient civilization was dead and the modern civilization was yet unborn. These ten centuries, in their estimation, constitute a zone of darkness separating the light of the Greco-Roman world from the light of

(1) What the author says of European historians is true of American authors as well. Thus we read in Webster’s International Dictionary: “The Middle Ages, the period of time intervening between the decline of the Roman Empire (A. D. 476) and the revival of letters.” (Translator's note.)
the Renaissance. (1) Note that the very definition puts the Middle Ages outside the pale of civilization and brands them as a night of a thousand years.

Let us see precisely in what consists the opposition thus formulated between the generally received idea of the Middle Ages and that of civilization. Which are the two civilizations separated by the "darkness" of the Middle Ages?

The first, of course, is the pagan civilization. With slavery as its foundation and Caesarism as its keystone, unable to satisfy the higher aspirations of the human soul, it offers all the enjoyment of life to the privileged few who wallow in sensual pleasures, but condemns the rest of humanity to slavery.

Which is the second or the modern civilization? Certainly not the Christian civilization, for otherwise the second period would not begin as late as the end of the Middle Ages, which were thoroughly imbued with the Christian idea. On the contrary, this second civilization is a civilization which reacts against the Christian ideal by evoking the pagan spirit from the ashes of the past and which, like paganism, gives the despotism of Caesar as a code to the State and the quest of pleasure as a law to the individual. It is a recurrence of pagan civiliza-

If, as most writers assert, the Middle Ages are really an intermediary period, it is precisely because this epoch enthrones the Christian ideal of mortification and poverty between the first and second periods of this pagan civilization. This aspect of the Middle Ages makes the second civilization but a

---

(1) Renaissance, the intellectual movement in Europe marked by a larger diffusion of classical learning and art in Italy in the fifteenth century and the similar revival following in other countries. This movement resulted from the gradual progress that had been going on during the Middle Ages for a thousand years. See: "The Church at the Turning Points of History" Kurth-Day, p. 123 (Tr. n.)
revival of the old civilization:—antiquity arises from the grave, again takes possession of the world, closes the parenthesis opened by the Middle Ages and begins anew the era of the great progress of humanity! This view of the Middle Ages would regard Christianity as nothing but an eclipse after whose passing men again walk the road of free scientific research and taste again the great aesthetic joys of life. The Renaissance virtually puts an end to Christianity. Civilization, paganism, and the Renaissance become synonyms just as barbarism, Christianity, and the Middle Ages are synonymous.

The current definition of the Middle Ages has created a misconception of the Middle Ages.

Thus, the definition of the Middle Ages, as we have recorded it without comment, is a definition with a double meaning. It implies more than would appear at first sight.

I do not say that the definition carries its full significance to the minds of those who use it, nor that the mere term "Middle Ages", whenever uttered, calls forth all the ideas which it connotes and without which it would be meaningless. Very frequently the words we use are merely conventional formulas whose real significance is not discerned, and which often convey quite the opposite of their true meaning.

This does not mean that in this given case the word has had no influence upon the idea. The word in question presents, or seems to present, an obvious meaning and this meaning becomes definite only when we oppose to the idea of the Middle Ages the idea of the two civilizations which it separates. This opposition led logically to the inference that medieval society was barbarous. Thus there arose a general prejudice against the people of the Middle Ages. As a whole they were considered coarse, barbarous, ignorant, dull, filthy, the dupes of crafty priests and of their own prejudices, either the subjects or the authors of all kinds of violence, incapable of public spirit, utterly unable to rise to the grand ideas of country, progress, social justice, and intellectual life.

Hence the many depressing legends which constitute the sum total of knowledge possessed by men of former centuries and by many of our own time concerning the Middle Ages. Picture to yourself what an encyclopedist of a hundred years ago thought of the Middle Ages, what certain belated followers of Voltaire think of them to the present day. Can one imagine a sadder, a more repugnant, a more hateful picture?

Let us look deeper into the matter. The encyclopedists of a hundred years ago and the belated followers of Voltaire say that the reign of Christianity began with the burning of the library of Alexandria, (1) which destroyed the intellectual patrimony of humanity, and that it came to a close with the funeral pyres of the Inquisition, (2) which burned those who endeavored to restore that patrimony.

(1) The Library of Alexandria founded about 284 B. C. contained, according to some historians, seven hundred thousand papyrus rolls (books). On the capture of the city by matter of the library to Caliph Omar and received the matter of the library to the Caliph Omar and received the answer: "If these writings of the Greeks agree with the book of God, (Koran, or the sacred book of the Mohammedans) they are useless and need not be preserved; if they disagree, they are pernicious, and ought to be destroyed." (Tr. n.)

(2) The Inquisition. The early Christian State was not indifferent to the admixture of error with the Christain religion. Starting from this viewpoint the Christian Roman Emperor Theodosius II, A. D. 407, declared heresy to be also a crime against the State, and threatened obstinate defenders of the heresies condemned by the Church with such punishments as imprisonment, banishment, confiscation of property, and in some cases even with death. This led to the establishment of the Ecclesiastical Inquisition and later of the Spanish Inquisition. The duty of the secular power to punish heretics was still recognized in the sixteenth century, by Catholics and Protestants alike. It is acknowledged by nobody today. (Tr. n.)
These same persons hold that, between these two conflagrations, in the gruesome twilight reddened by their flames and screened by their smoke, we observe that succession of distressing pictures which have earned for the Middle Ages the contempt of all friends of humanity.

What a horrible spectacle is thus presented to us! They would have us believe that during those ages a council gravely discussed whether or not woman has a soul; and that one of the sex, no doubt to retaliate on an un gallant episcopacy, succeeded in mounting the chair of Peter.

They would have us believe that at the very time the papacy was guilty of such scandal it worked with the greatest zeal at forging false titles. According to them, the papacy, during the eighth century, forged the "Donation of Constantine" (1) and, in the ninth century, fabricated the False Decretals (2) in order to further establish its title to the pretended donation.

They represent the Church authorities enslaving and brutalizing the nations, for centuries winking at

(1) Donation of Constantine. By this name is understood, since the end of the Middle Ages, a forged document of Emperor Constantine the Great (A. D. 337) by which large privileges and rich possessions were conferred on the Pope and the Roman Church. This document is without doubt a forgery, fabricated somewhere between the years 750 and 850. (Tr. n.)

(2) False Decretals, or the Decretals of the Pseudo-Isidore, is a name given to certain apocryphal papal letters contained in a collection of canon laws, compiled about the middle of the ninth century, by an author who uses the pseudonym of Isidore Mercator. For the past four hundred years the opponents of the Papacy have asserted that its power and authority from the Middle Ages onward were based chiefly on the "False Decretals." The Church heard the charge with the greatest equanimity, for she knew full well that Papal claims could be proved independently of the forged documents. In 1914 Mr. Davenport, an English Protestant lawyer, took up the cudgels for the Church, and won the Lothian prize at Oxford with an essay on the "False Decretals" in which he refutes the inaccurate statements of many anti-Catholic writers on the subject. (Tr. n.)
the infamous "right of the lord", and not opposing the custom of the lords who returning from the hunt were wont to slash open the stomachs of their tenants to take a warm footbath.

This dismal picture of the Middle Ages represents a helpless and stupified people whose only hope was the frightful expectation of the Last Judgment: they looked for the end of the world in the year One Thousand, and were quite surprised that the end of that year found the world still existing.

In the shadows of this same picture we see the people—innocent victims of an avaricious and fanatical clergy—dragged for centuries to the far off butcheries of the Orient, bringing back leprosy as the only reward for their exploits (1). And we are told further that even this terrible plague was powerless to teach them cleanliness, that during the entire Middle Ages our ancestors wallowed in disgusting filth, for Michelet says that the people had not a bath for a thousand years.

And to add more gloom to the picture they tell us that the people were without the consolations which intellectual life affords. They assure us that there was no science and that the people were with-

---

(1) The Crusades were expeditions into the Mohammedan lands, undertaken by the Christian nations of western Europe, at the suggestion of the Popes, to insure protection to the Christian pilgrims to the Holy Land and to rescue the Holy Sepulcher of Christ from the Mohammedans. The Crusades put a stop to the incessant wars of petty princes, saved Europe from conquest by the Turk, prolonged the life of the Eastern Empire for four centuries, led to the establishment of trade relations with the Eastern peoples, gave a new impetus to the sciences and arts of Western Europe, gave the Communes and the serfs a chance to buy their freedom from their lords and masters, procured the crown of martyrdom for millions of Christian heroes, secured protection for pilgrims to the Holy Land and rescued, at least for a time, the Holy Sepulchre from the Turks. The Crusader stands forever as the type of the soldier who fights for a high and noble ideal; hence the American Expeditionary Forces in France in the World War were called "Pershing's Crusaders." (Tr. n.) out schools, as it was to the interest of the Church to maintain ignorance; that there was no intellectual effort, no philosophy, as all spontaneous mental activity was considered a sin against faith. They would have us believe that the Middle Ages were without art excepting, of course, certain monuments which, they claimed, came from the Arabians and whose barbarism was best expressed by coining the word "Gothic". We are told that there was no poetry: Boileau himself repeats this in his "Art Poétique" where he asserts that poetry was unknown until Villon disentangled the involved art of our ancient romancers and that the theater was a pleasure unknown to our devout ancestors (1). Finally, Malherbe came (2). And after Malherbe followed Erasmus (3) and Luther (4) and the Humanists (5)

(1) Boileau-Despréaux, Nicholas, French poet, satirist and critic (1636-1711), best known by his "Art Poétique" in which he gives the history and lays down, in verse, the rules of poetic composition in the French language. (Tr. n.)

(2) François de Malherbe, French poet, born in 1555, died in 1628. (Tr. n.)

(3) Erasmus, Desiderius Erasmus of Rotterdam was the most celebrated humanist of his time, a man of great learning but destitute of nobility of character, and of uncertain disposition. He was first the friend, then the opponent of Luther. He died in Basle A. D. 1536. By his edition of the "Fathers of the Church" he rendered great service to patristic literature. (Tr. n.)

(4) Luther, born in Eisleben, Saxony, A. D. 1483, became an Augustinian monk in 1505. In 1508 he was made professor of philosophy at Wittenberg. On October 31, 1517, he affixed his famous ninety-five theses to the door of the castle church of Wittenberg. This action inaugurated the movement known as the Protestant Reformation, which rejected the authority of the Pope, Transubstantiation, etc., taught the doctrine of justification by faith alone, that man is wholly corrupted by the Fall, and that the Bible is the sole rule of faith. (Tr. n.)

(5) Humanism is the name given to the intellectual, literary, and scientific movement of the fourteenth, fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, a movement which aimed at basing every branch of learning on the literature and culture of classical antiquity. Believing that a classical training alone could form a perfect man, the followers of this movement called themselves "Humanists". (Tr. n.)
and the Reformers, who, in the common estimation, were the saviors to lead our ancestors back to the traditional paths of civilization.

Refutation of legends concerning the Middle Ages.

More than one of our contemporaries have still to learn that long ago science disposed of this dark aspect of the Middle Ages. The pitiless hand of criticism has forever demolished the edifice of fable built up since the time of the Renaissance, chiefly by the self-styled philosophers of the eighteenth century. A cursory review of the answers made by criticism to the assertions of Voltaire (1) and of the "Encyclopedists" (2) will be a pleasant diversion.

The Myth of the Soulless Woman.

If there is any fable which lays bare the folly of its peddlers, it is certainly that which represents the Council of Macon discussing the question of the soul of woman. It would be an offense to the intelligence of my readers if I thought it necessary to state that this question was never raised in Christian society, either at the Council of Macon, or elsewhere. At

(1) Voltaire, Francois, Arouet de (1694-1778), a French writer who devoted his versatile talents to reviving the calumnies of the Roman pagan writer Celsus against the Apostles and the first Christians, and to popularizing the religious errors of the Freethinkers of England. Luther had cherished a violent hatred against the Vicar of Christ. Voltaire bore such a hatred against Christ himself. His watchword was "Écrasez l’Infâme" (Crush the Infamous viz. Christ and Christianity). One of his favorite maxims was: "Lie! Lie! my friends, and something will be sure to stick." (Tr. n.)

(2) The Encyclopedists were the writers of the "Encyclopédie," a work in twenty-eight folio volumes published in French between 1751 and 1772, under the direction of Diderot (1713-1784). The aim of the Encyclopédie in religious matters was the rejection of all Christian dogma. (Tr. n.)
the Council of Macon there was a bishop—somewhat of a purist—who took exception to the word "man" as applied to woman. But they convinced him that his scruple as to grammar was unfounded, since Scripture itself more than once uses the word in this meaning. This is the whole story, and we may award a dunce-cap to any one who thinks he knows more than this about it (1).

Popess Joan.

It would be even more preposterous today to peddle the story of the Popess Joan (2). Should a present-day writer with any pretention to erudition undertake to refute this fable, he would offend all intelligent authors and be looked upon as one out of date and wasting precious time.

We put aside these two anecdotes which a century ago "strong minds" used as "terrible arguments" against the Catholic faith and pass on to more serious questions.

Donation of Constantine.

It is claimed that it was the papacy that invented the story of the "Donation of Constantine". We

---

(1) Godfrey Kurth, "Le Concile de Macon et les femmes," in "La Revue des questions historiques", vol. LI., April, 1892.

See also "America" in the following numbers: March 24, 1915; January 9, 1916; January 22, 1916; March 11, 1916; March 18, 1916; and March 25, 1916. (Tr. n.)

(2) Popess Joan is supposed to have occupied the Chair of Peter from 855 to 857 according to one "authority", and about 1100 according to another "authority", whilst the fable is first noticed in literature in the middle of the thirteenth century. But the legendary person does not fit in at either time, because at both times the Chair of Peter was occupied by well known Popes. This matter is treated at length in "The Catholic World" for September, 1914, in "The Legend of Pope Joan" by Rev. Bertrand L. Conway, C. S. P. admit that "The Donation of Constantine" is a legend. It is a pious legend, which aims to account for the origin of the Temporal Power of the Pope by connecting it with the first Christian Emperor, just as the Romans of the Republic connected all their military and religious institutions with their first kings, Romulus and Numa Pompilius. But to pretend that this legend was invented by the Papacy in order to establish its title, is to show absolute ignorance of the Catholic philosophy of law; for, being in uncontested possession of the sovereignty of fact from time immemorial, the Papacy had, by that very fact, a title, namely, that of prescription with the tacit consent of the nations. But even were it otherwise, this charge against the Papacy should be supported at least by a shadow of proof. But no proof is offered, the charge is gratuitous, rash, and unjust to the Papacy; it has no foundation, and we have the right to ignore it.

False Decretals.

And the False Decretals? Has not enough printer's ink been wasted on that subject, and have not a sufficient number of contradictory solutions been invented? Almost every year the question is again up for discussion and a new birthplace is assigned to this notorious apocryphal collection. Of late Rheims and Le Mans have been mentioned most frequently, and no doubt still other towns will be named; but curiously enough Rome has not yet been suggested. Of course, the question of place is not very important, and if it were really proven that the authority of the Roman Pontiffs in the Church rests on an apocryphal document we could only blush and hang our heads in shame. But, far from this being the case, the documents themselves prove the contrary, because they invoke the authority of the Popes themselves to withdraw the bishops from the jurisdiction of their metropolitan and subject them directly to the Holy See. The "False Decretals," far from giving authority to the Popes, presuppose that authority. (1)

The Right of the Lord.

Now we come to the infamous accusation that for centuries the feudal lords enjoyed, in the case of young married women of their vassalage, a right so revolting that pagan antiquity had never heard of such a thing and would have branded the abuse with indignation had it been known. Moreover, this charge implies that the Catholic Church, which has always considered virginity as the most glorious title of the two sexes, which condemns even a look or a thought contrary to chastity, which has fought countless fights against kings and lords of this world in defense of the inviolability of the conjugal tie, would have winked at a practice which made of man a brute and of woman a prey. The Church would have kept a cowardly silence in presence of adultery raised to the dignity of a public institution for the benefit of a few lewd lords! But this consideration has not stopped the wretches from repeating this lowest and vilest of calumnies. Unfortunately for them, the works of Louis Veuillot and Karl Schmidt have so shattered this legend that one cannot repeat it without risking one's reputation. (2)

Warm Blood Bath.

We need merely mention the legend of the warm blood bath which, upon his return from the hunt, the

---

(1) "The Catholic World" for August, 1917, or "False Decretals" by Bertrand L. Conway, C. S. P., published in pamphlet form by The Paulist Press, New York. (Tr. n.)

lord was supposed to have taken in the entrails of his tenants. The legend has had but a restricted circulation, and the common sense of readers has refused it credence.

The Terrors of the Year One Thousand.

We now come to the supposed terrors of the year One Thousand. Public credulity fell a victim to this legend. The readers of the nineteenth century believed in these so-called terrors as unanimously as their ancestors are supposed to have experienced them. Well, it is established to-day that the Terrors of the Year One Thousand are nothing but a legend made up by the writers of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, chiefly by Robertson, in the introduction to his "History of Charles V". As this work has enjoyed great popularity, every one repeats the legend on the authority of Robertson, without thinking of verifying it. In an article of the "Revue des Questions Historiques" published in 1873, Dom Plain had but to blow upon the fabrication of Robertson to dissipate it into thin air. Since then, several historians of renown have repeated and completed the demonstration of Dom Plain. The case has been heard and decided. Henceforth there will be no more question of the year One Thousand in our textbooks of history.

Leprosy.

Do you really think that "historians" will not write again of the Terrors of the Year One Thousand? I fear I have made a rash statement in saying so, for, if there is a truth attested by experience, it is the good nature with which, in historiography, authors continue religiously to repeat to new generations errors long since disposed of by science. This reminds us of the stars which according to the astronomers have disappeared ages ago, and which, nevertheless, still send their light to globes scattered in endless space. The history of leprosy supplies a proof of this tender solicitude of certain writers for legends that have gone out of fashion. Does not every one know,—do not all writers repeat, that leprosy was brought to the West by the Crusaders after the eleventh century? Now, fourteen years ago, I established in the most peremptory manner the falsity of this legend, and I showed that, down from the fourth century, leprosy was spread throughout all the lands of western Europe; that, from the fourth to the twelfth century, it existed, without interruption; that Church and State and private charity gave it attention; that the Church councils and the civil governments enacted laws concerning it; that there existed numerous lazarus-houses; and, finally, that there is not the slightest evidence that the Crusades even contributed to increase the number of lepers. (1) But in spite of my demonstration to the contrary, "historians", even in specialized works, continue to repeat that leprosy was introduced into Western Europe by the Crusades. My readers may acquaint themselves with the proofs of the above facts by consulting my paper on the subject.

No Baths in a Thousand Years.

But really it was not necessary to blame leprosy on the Crusades, since a more direct and permanent cause could have been alleged, namely, the "horrible filth" prevailing during that epoch. In fact, Michelet did not overlook the opportunity. (2) According to him, leprosy was due to the fact that people did not wash during the Middle Ages: "Not a bath in a thousand years!" (He forgets the warm blood baths!) The beautiful stereotyped formula of Michelet was well calculated to inoculate shallow minds with the doctrines of the author, but proves to be a boomerang to his memory, since it convicts him of unpardonable levity. Has there not been enough idle talk on this foolish statement? Indeed it is well established that during the Middle Ages baths were among the most popular and universal institutions, that there was not a town however small that did not have its public baths, (1) and that, on the contrary, it was the Renaissance which permitted the habits of cleanliness of the Middle Ages gradually to fall into desuetude, substituting for them a negligence which degenerated into the most repulsive uncleanliness. (2) We can but pity those who are ignorant of these well established facts and who to the present day peddle stories so thoroughly discredited in history.

(2) Michelet, Jules, French historian and miscellaneous writer (1798-1874). (Tr. n.)

These considerations show that the Middle Ages of legend cannot withstand the Middle Ages of history. Not wishing to prolong an enumeration which might be continued almost indefinitely, I have confined myself to these specimens of rectification for the benefit of those who know the past only from their readings of the "Encyclopédie" or its trailers.

Criticism of the current definition of the term "Middle Ages." This definition is taken from philology and has a meaning entirely different from the one contemptuously attributed to it.

But no rectification of details, even when they are important, can do away with the false ideas concerning the Middle Ages, so long as people persist in considering them as a break between two periods of civilization. Since this error is altogether due to the definition, I shall show how that definition is deceiving and without foundation.

---

I remark first that the definition is entirely verbal, and consists of puerile tautology. All that the definition teaches is that the Middle Ages are middle ages. This seems to imply little enough, but it was not all that the term conveyed to the minds of those who created it. In its primitive acceptance the expression had quite a different meaning from that given it today; and I claim that, as applied to the first ten centuries, this meaning is wrong and almost misleading. I now offer proofs for my contention.

History is a relatively recent science; it is only of late that it has acquired a method of its own, and has freed itself from philology, of which it was a part up to the sixteenth century. Therefore we should not be surprised that the historians, who followed after the philologists, should have borrowed from them their terminology, and carried into the domain of historical studies words which lost their meaning in crossing the border line. The term in question is a striking instance of the disadvantages resulting from such borrowing.

In studying the development of the Latin tongue, from its origin down to their own time, the philologists had noticed its several periods, and had given each a name. The first period was that of the classical Latin, which witnessed the birth of the masterpieces of Roman literature, and during which the Latin language was spoken by all the people who partook of the Roman civilization. The second period was that of the barbarian Latin. When the Roman civilization perished in Western Europe,
(1) the Latin language was inherited by the Germanic peoples who were strangers to its genius and who, intermingled with the Roman populations, gradually learned the Latin tongue but disfigured it in divers ways in the various countries in which they lived, so that Latin as spoken by them became a new language. Finally, there came a period when these neo-Latin languages, now definitely fixed, became the only language of the people, whilst the Latin, left to the men of learning, existed thenceforth in books only, and became a dead language.

The first of these periods, as commonly accepted, extended from the beginning of the Roman State down to the reign of Constantine the Great. (2) Indeed it was under the administration of this prince that the Barbarians first flocked in compact masses into the Empire to serve it until they might enslave it. The second period extended to the reign of

(1) In 476 the Latin Empire of the West ceased to be, and its rich provinces became the prey of the Germanic tribes. Great Britain was conquered by the Anglo-Saxons, Gaul by the Franks and Burgundians, Spain by the Visigoths and the Suevi, Italy by the Ostrogoths and the Lombards, and Africa by the Vandals. (Tr. n.)

(2) Constantine the Great, son of Constantine Chlorus, joint emperor with Galerius, in 312 marched upon Maxentius, the worthless ruler of Rome. One day, shortly after noon-time, while pondering on the heavy odds that were against him, he and the soldiers who happened to be with him beheld a fiery cross in the sky with this inscription: "In touto nika" (In this conquer). During the following night Christ, in a vision, told him to approach the enemy under the standard of the cross. This Constantine did. The new standard, called "Labarum", preceded his host in the battle at the Milvian Bridge. Maxentius suffered a crushing defeat, and was drowned in the Tiber. Constantine publicly ascribed the victory to the God of the Christians, and embraced the Christian faith, in which he was later baptized. In 313, Constantine, together with Licinius, his ally, issued the famous edict of Milan by which full liberty was granted to the Christians. This event marks the beginning of a new era for Christianity, for the Roman Empire, and for the world at large. The victory of Christianity at this time and the subsequent general conversion of the Empire's population, made possible the conversion and civilization of the Barbarians, who were to conquer the Empire politically. (Tr. n.)
Charlemagne (1). During this period the Latin tongue fell under the control of the Barbarians, became the instrument of their culture and the vehicle of their general ideas, until the advent of the modern languages. The third period began after the death of Charlemagne, and witnessed the birth of the modern languages. It heard their first stammerings in the oath of Strasburg (A. D. 842) (2) and assisted successively at the births of the various neo-Latin tongues of all Europe.

To each of these three ages of the Latin tongue

(1) Charlemagne (742-814), King of the Franks, first sovereign of the Christian Empire of the West, was a great patron of letters. Under his reign, notwithstanding his continual wars, he established schools throughout his empire. He invited Alcuin (A. D. 804), a distinguished English scholar and pupil of the Venerable Bede, and under his direction established academies. The sons of the more wealthy flocked to his lectures. Alcuin spoke Latin, Greek, and Hebrew, was master of philosophy, theology, history, and mathematics. Under his supervision the schools of the empire became celebrated, and scholars from all Europe came to learn wisdom at his feet. The impulse thus given to letters by Charlemagne was continued by his successors. The statues of Constantine the Great and Charlemagne grace the vestibule of the basilica of St. Peter in Rome. (Tr. n.)

(2) The Oath of Strasburg is the earliest extant specimen of the French language. In 842, in the presence of their assembled armies at Strasburg, Charles the Bald and Louis the Germanic, grandsons of Charlemagne, took this solemn oath of friendship and fidelity, forming an alliance against their eldest brother Lothaire. The oath was made in German to the German army by Charles the Bald, King of the West Franks, and in early French to the West Franks by Louis the Germanic, and is preserved in both languages. It might be interesting to quote the opening words of the oath both in early German and in early French. To show the gradual evolution of modern French from the Latin tongue during the Middle Ages, we add to the early French both Latin and modern French translations:

Latin: Pro Dei amore et pro christiani populi et nostrum salutem.
Early French: Pro Deo amur et pro christiano popolo et nostro commun salvament.
Modern French: Pour l'amour de Dieu et pour le salut du peuple chrétien et notre salut commun.
German: In Godes minna ind in thes christianes folches ind unser bedhere gehaltinss.
English: For God's love and for the salvation of the Christian people and our common salvation. (Tr. n.)
the philologists had given a name to mark its proper place in the development of the language. The first age was naturally called the high or superior age; the second, the middle age; the third, the inferior or low age. Thus the term "Middle Ages", according to its etymology and in its primitive acceptance, designated nothing else than a period of latinity extending between the reigns of Constantine the Great and Charlemagne. This was the meaning ascribed to it by the Humanists, also by Ducange when he gave to his celebrated dictionary the title "Glossarium mediae et infimæ latinitatis". (Dictionary of Middle and Low Latin) (1)

In borrowing the term "Middle Ages" from the philologists, and transferring it to the domain of historiography, the historians at first did not modify its meaning. They adopted both the name and the period which it covered and designated as the "Middle Ages" that historical and political period which intervened between Constantine the Great and Charlemagne. The entire period subsequent to Charlemagne, they designated as the "aetas infima", or "low age". It is now known as the modern epoch.

But while the historians were adopting the language of the philologists, the Humanists were extending the limits they had at first assigned to their "Middle Ages". They began to look upon their time as a fourth and new age of latinity. They loved to think that, under the magic influence of their pen, the Latin tongue had been regenerated and restored to its pristine purity, and they saw in the period beginning with the sixteenth century a new phase of latinity which marked its second birth, or renaissance. Thenceforth they united the second and third periods, both of which had marked the decline of the Latin tongue, and called them the middle period. Thus they extended the middle ages of the Latin language to a period stretching from the decline of the Roman Empire under Constantine the Great to the Renaissance.

(1) Ducange, Charles du Fresne, French historian and philologist. (1610-1688) (Tr. n.)

And again the historians followed in the footsteps of the philologists. They took the ten Christian centuries which the philologists marked as blank in regard to latinity—itself a debatable matter—and marked them as blank also as regards civilization. The exchange of terms brought about the exchange of viewpoints, and confusion of ideas resulted from the confusion of words.

Thus the term "Middle Ages" in its present acceptance, fraudulently passed into the language of historiography; it cannot furnish a regular birth certificate, for it is the offspring of a confusion of ideas.

First uses of the term "Middle Ages" in its present sense.

It is not my task to determine when the term "Middle Ages" was first used in its present sense. I find that in 1639 it was already a part of the regular vocabulary. (1)

However, strictly speaking, I do not hold historians responsible for the misunderstanding. The pedagogues are the real culprits. The desire to classify is a characteristic trait of the schoolman. Thus, it was a professor, Christopher Keller, better known by his latinized name, Cellarius, who first used the term in the title of a textbook (A. D. 1688). (2)

Another schoolman, Loeschler, introduced the word into a German work published in the year

(2) Chr. Cellarii "Historia Medii Aevi, a temporibus Constantini Magni ad Constantinopolim a Turcis captam deducta." Iena 1688.
1725; since then the expression has been in constant use in pedagogical works and gradually found its way into literary productions.

But not before the second half of the eighteenth century does the term appear in literary works. And the great writers of that epoch, in France as well as in Germany, use it seldom and with hesitancy. The French Academy did not admit the term into the official repertoire of the language until the publication of the sixth edition of its dictionary, in 1835. (1)

I think that the above considerations utterly discredit the common definition of the designation "Middle Ages".

The Middle Ages are not an intermediary period; on the contrary, they are the beginning of modern society.

But it may be contended that in spite of its etymology the term "Middle Ages" is the appropriate name of an intermediary epoch.

Such a contention is false, and cannot be justified from an historical viewpoint. Far from being intermediary between the ancient and the modern civilizations, the "Middle Ages" are the beginning of modern civilization. This modern civilization did not begin with the epoch of the Renaissance but is the offspring of Christianity, and we must seek its cradle as near as possible to the crib of Bethlehem. It began when the pagan civilization of Rome collapsed. On the ruins of pagan civilization new societies were built which were Christian in principle, if not in their material elements.

(1) The French Academy is a national institution of France, founded by Cardinal de Richelieu in 1635. It is composed of forty members popularly called the "Immortals". The object for which the Academy was founded was the purification of the French language. To attain this end it compiled a dictionary. The office of the Academy is not to create words, but to register words approved by the authority of the best writers and by good society. (Tr. n.)

These societies still stand on their original foundation, Christian morality. They were begun during the centuries of the Middle Ages and continued to flourish during subsequent centuries. We are the heirs of the Middle Ages, not, as some would have it, the heirs of Greece and Rome. But in our study of the classics our views in this matter are apt to become so distorted that it is necessary to verify an evident truth.

We offer the following proof of our position:

Whatever is lasting and fruitful in modern society, regarding institutions and ideas, has its roots deep in the fertile soil of the first Christian centuries.

The Middle Ages put an end to ancient slavery and called all men to freedom. To loosen link by link the chain of slavery was the work of centuries. It resulted in the most positive accomplishment of modern civilization.

The Middle Ages rent the imperial unity of the world and substituted the modern nationalities. These nationalities still exist, and the twentieth century has no higher task than to guard their welfare and foster their friendly relations.

The Middle Ages created the modern languages, and thereby gradually eliminated the Latin. These are the languages which we speak today and which hold unprecedented eminence in the world of thought.

The Middle Ages accepted the Christian Faith with love and defended it on every battlefield and with every weapon. Is not the Christian faith the queen of the world to the present day? Has any non-Christian conception of the universe been embodied in an organization as glorious as the Church, or here below manifested itself by a more marvelous fecundity?

The Middle Ages made the Papacy the most respected institution of the world. Even in our own time the preeminence of the Papacy is undisputed.

The Middle Ages enforced the distinction between the temporal and the spiritual, the great principle which flows from the Gospel, and which in the past has renovated and today upholds the political and social spirit of the civilized world.

The Middle Ages founded the constitutional monarchy and representative government, both unknown to antiquity, but which are indispensable conditions for the political existence of modern nations.

Under the shelter of these public liberties, which were guaranteed by covenant between prince and subject, the Middle Ages gave impetus to all forms of association, from the municipal corporation down to the labor union, and bequeathed to us models to which, in spite of the storms of revolution, humanity unceasingly turns for imitation.

The art of the Middle Ages has become our art. The name Gothic, (1) which was applied to the architecture of the Middle Ages as a term of contempt, is bestowed on our art as a title of glory and to-day we draw inspiration from the very words which our predecessors despised.

(1) The word Gothic designates the style of architecture which flourished in the western part of Europe from the end of the twelfth century to the revival of the classical styles in the sixteenth century. Generally speaking, it is at once the most scientific and the most artistic style of architecture. It is the most scientific because its whole strength is made to reside in a finely organized and frankly confessed framework rather than in walls. This framework, made up of piers, arches and buttresses, is freed from every unnecessary incumbrance of wall and is rendered as light in all its parts as is compatible with strength. It is the most artistic style because the liberal, harmonious and consistent use of the pointed arch, the trefoil, the quatrefoil, the cinquefoil, foliated capitals, deep mouldings, finials, crockets, four-leaved flowers, etc., enable the artist to make Gothic buildings pictures of perfect beauty. (Tr. n.)
The poets of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries gloried in their ignorance of the national poetry of the Middle Ages; we love it, we admire it, we have given it our undying affection. Littre has shown how unjust is the contemptuous attitude of Boileau towards the literature of the Middle Ages. (1)

And we shall not have surpassed the Middle Ages until we shall have erected a more beautiful cathedral than that of Rheims, (2) painted a more inspiring canvas than the picture of the Adoration of the Lamb, (3) and written a poem more powerful than the Divina Commedia (4). All that we

(1) Littre, Maximilien Paul Emile. French philologist (1801-1881). (Tr. n.)
(2) The Cathedral of Rheims is called the national cathedral of France, whose kings were consecrated within its sacred precincts. The first stone of the present structure was laid in 1212, the main front with its superb towers was completed in 1427. The Cathedral of Rheims is considered by many the most perfect specimen of decorated Gothic architecture in existence on account of the symmetry of its proportions, the purity of its style, the gracefulness of its lines, the wealth of its sculptural decorations numbering two thousand five hundred statues, six hundred of which grace the main entrance. (Tr. n.)
(3) The Adoration of the Lamb painted by Hubert Van Eyck and John Van Eyck, his brother, Belgian painters, between 1420 and 1432. It is now in the cathedral of St. Bavon of Ghent, Belgium. It is a polyptych, or painting of many panels, each one of which constitutes a group, and all of which make but one main subject. The Adoration of the Lamb is the pictorial representation of Apocalypse: "After this I saw a great multitude, which no man could number, of all nations, and tribes, and peoples, and tongues, standing before the throne, and in sight of the Lamb, clothed with white robes, and palms in their hands. And they cried with a loud voice, saying: Salvation to our God, who sitteth upon the throne, and to the Lamb" (Apoc., VII. 9-10). For a detailed description see: "Belgium: Its Cities". Vol. I, Grant Allen. Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston. (Tr. n.)
(4) "Divina Commedia," written by Dante Alighieri, Italian poet, born at Florence, in 1265, and who died at Ravenna, Italy, September 14, 1321. His best known work is the "Divina Commedia", which lends the charm of poetry to the truths of religion, whilst leading the reader through Hell, Purgatory, and Heaven. This sacred poem sums up the knowledge and intellectual attainment of the Middle Ages, and places Dante among the few supreme poets of the world. (Tr. n.) have—our religion and our political ideas, our nationality and our language, our aesthetics and our social economy—all these connect us with the Middle Ages and separate us from antiquity. We are the heirs of the Middle Ages; we continue their work, not the work of the Renaissance.

The Renaissance is, in a certain sense, an intermediary period.

If there be any epoch to which we may apply the term "Middle Ages", is it not the Renaissance itself which opened in the history of modern nations a parenthesis now closed or soon to be closed? The idols of the Renaissance are now overthrown, and we turn away from its ideal. We try to keep clear of royal absolutism and of the centralization which is its logical consequence. We utterly repudiate the famous maxim of the sixteenth century "Cujus regio ejus religio", the religion of the ruler must be the religion of the kingdom, which maxim is but another rendering of the Ulpian oracle, "Quod principi placuit legis habet vigorem", whatever pleases the ruler has the force of law. In matters of art and literature we have formally broken with classicism and have returned to the national traditions, to the sources of popular and Christian inspiration. The modern spirit repudiates that purely pagan conception of life which would have the soul with all its faculties gravitate towards the two poles of voluptuousness and glory; the modern spirit offers as motive for individual effort the sentiment of human solidarity and disinterested love of social progress.

Over the head of the Renaissance we clasp hands with our ancestors of the Middle Ages; we again tread the paths from which we had been led astray by the Renaissance.
Does this mean that we should meet one extreme with another by denying all indebtedness to the Renaissnace and by casting away the contribution which the Renaissance has brought to the treasury of civilization? By no means! Humanity has no right to self-mutilation but must gratefully accept whatever is contributory to its intellectual and moral power. Now, the Renaissance is one of the most splendid intellectual phenomena of history; it developed such wealth of genius and enlarged the intellectual horizon of the world to such an extent as to win for itself an enduring title to the admiration and gratitude of posterity.

The Renaissance in all its vital elements was but an efflorescence of the Middle Ages.

But, in this connection, we should bear in mind that the Renaissance was not a revolution, nor, as its name indicated, a rebirth; but rather the culmination of a centuries-long development during which the Middle Ages advanced beyond the period of infancy and by sheer courage and energy attained the sunlit heights. The society of the Middle Ages after groping for centuries in bold endeavor finally reached and held the summit of progress, rounded the Cape of Good Hope, (1) discovered the New World, invented printing, found anew the buried riches of ancient civilization. There is in this development a social efflorescence of which humanism is but one manifestation. It is the glad budding forth of a sturdy plant, which, before opening to the sunlight and displaying its wealth and excellence, must first experience the wondrous rising of the sap and undergo the patient and hidden work of vegetation.

(1) In finally rounding the Cape of Good Hope, after centuries of undaunted efforts, the Portuguese opened the way to India by water. (Tr. n.)
For instance, the route to India was not discovered in a single attempt. A complete account of this great achievement would include the story of the Portuguese navigators, who in hazardous expeditions explored the coasts of Africa from point to point, and thus advanced from one promontory to another. Imagine what an amount of energy, science, adventure was amassed before a man of genius could think of launching out boldly on the unfathomable ocean.

And as to Humanism itself, it was connected with the Middle Ages by an unbroken series of links, from Nicholas V, (1) to Petrarch, (2) from Petrarch to Dante, and from Dante to Charlemagne, without a break in the literary tradition of the classies and without any lagging in the enthusiastic study of these literary masterpieces.

From this aspect, the Renaissance is the continuation of the Middle Ages, the daughter and lawful

(1) Nicolas V., Tomasso Parentucelli, born at Sarzana, Italy, November 15, 1397, was elected Pope February 3, 1337, and died in Rome, March 25, 1455. The aim of his pontificate was to make Rome the home of literature and art, the city of splendid monuments, the worthy capital of the Christian world. During his pontificate scholars of all nations were welcomed to the Vatican as friends, and frequently assisted by him in their financial needs. No department of literature owes him so much as history. The crowning glory of his pontificate was the foundation of the Vatican Library where he sumptuously housed precious manuscripts which his agents had patiently gathered from every country in Europe. (Tr. n.)

(2) Petrarch, Francis, Italian poet and humanist, born July 20, 1304, died July 19, 1374. In 1323 Francis took minor orders and later received a canonical benefice. From 1330 to 1337 he journeyed through France, Germany, and Italy until he finally settled in Vaucluse, France, and there he found the peace and the inspiration that produced so many of his best lyrics. On Easter Sunday, 1341, he was publicly crowned as poet and historian in the Capitol of Rome. As a scholar, Petrarch possessed encyclopedic knowledge much of which he has set down in his various Latin works. His abiding fame is based upon his Italian poetry contained in the "Triumphi" and the "Canzoniere." These begot for Petrarch legions of followers in Italy. Petrarch was the intimate friend of Boccaccio, who, like himself, desired to promote humanistic studies and researches. (Tr. n.) heiress of the preceding centuries, and not a stranger who throws upon the marketplace of the European nations the riches of a newly discovered world. Doubtless the Renaissance possessed something unknown to the Middle Ages, upholding, as it did, the pagan conception of life. For some time thereafter this pagan element prevailed in certain literary centers, but, like an ill chosen graft on a vigorous trunk, it withered, and undoubtedly it will have no further influence on the progress of civilization. The only enduring features of the Renaissance are the elements which link it to the Catholic and popular tradition of the Middle Ages.

The Middle Ages do not present the ideal state of society.

It will be seen that we are not of the possible few who believe that the Middle Ages had reached the ideal perfection of society; nor do we contend that modern progress is a retrogression to medieval conditions. No, peoples as well as individuals may look back in fond recollection to the smiling years of childhood without longing to be children again. The Middle Ages are the period of our younger years; we prize them dearly as the time of our vigorous youth—a youth not made anemic by lack of light, not corrupted in a vitiated atmosphere, but a youth which was freely and proudly developed in the air and sunlight and which produced the vigorous constitution of our present society. When we pride ourselves on our present condition, we honor the vigorous red blood of our ancestors.

However, we must admit that our first centuries were not without the defects peculiar to all childhood. The social temperament of that young age was marked by an exuberance of spirit and a lack of discipline which frequently led to violent outbursts, and its untamed nature asserted itself even in the most beautiful manifestations of individual and public life. Our fathers were often misled by their imagination, and too often they were victims of an idealism so absolute that at times they seemed to spend their lives in dreams. They lacked confidence in their own power of mind and relied too much on the word of the preceptor; they submitted too readily to teachers who, no doubt, were worthy of respect, but who sometimes were an obstacle to initiative. Moreover, they lacked sufficient experience to appreciate at its full value the civilization they enjoyed; with a naivete almost tragic they were willing to exchange their treasures for the counterfeit money of innovators of all kinds.

These are great defects of which we have partly freed ourselves in the course of centuries, though we may have contracted other defects no less objectionable. Let us repeat that, whatever we are today, we are the outgrowth of the Middle Ages, with their virtues and their faults, drawing our inspiration from the Gospel and not from the Digest, (1) preferring the Magna Charta (2) to the Lex Regia, (3) praying in the Sainte Chapelle (4) rather than in the Parthenon (5). Indeed we may define mod-

(1) The term "Digest" is applied in a general sense to the Pandects of Justinian, which are an abridgement, in fifty books, of the decisions, writings, and opinions of the old Roman jurists, made in the sixth century, by direction of the Emperor Justinian, and forming the leading compilation of the Roman civil law. (Tr. n.)

(2) "Magna Charta Libertatis" or the "Great Charter of Liberty," was wrested from King John by the English barons, sustained by Archbishop Stephen Langton on the plains of Runnymede, in 1215. (Tr. n.)

(3) "Lex Regia" or "The Royal Law" was a Roman law relating to the powers of the Roman Emperors. (Tr. n.)

(4) "Sainte Chapelle" is a Catholic church built in Paris, during the reign of St. Louis IX, King of France, in the purest decorated Gothic style. (Tr. n.)

(5) "The Parthenon" was a celebrated pagan temple of Athens. It was built on the Acropolis, of Pentelic marble, in correct Greek style of the Doric variety. (Tr. n.)
ern society to be the society of the Middle Ages at its maturity.

This brings me to my conclusion.

Strictly speaking there are no Middle Ages.

The term "Middle Ages" is but a provisional name which future lexicographers will discard and which in reality designates the youth of the modern world. The golden chain which connects all the Christian centuries has no break, and whatever goes to make up our civilization has its source in the inexhaustible springs of life which were opened up by Christianity nineteen centuries ago. There are no Middle Ages; there is a modern society identically the same from the days of its origin, and this society is the daughter of the Gospel. In this sense, I willingly admit with the English Historian Freeman, (1) that the lines of demarcation drawn by chronologists have but a formal and purely pedagogical value; each period is already contained in the one which precedes it and finds itself again in the one which follows.

The Line of Demarcation in the world's history is Golgotha.

But I hasten to add that to this rule there is a transcendent and unique exception. There is a line of demarcation which separates into two grand divisions the history of humankind. It is the line which bears on its summit the Cross of Golgotha. And why? Because it is there that was heard the Fiat Lux (Light be made) of a second creation; because thence there came down upon the world the new law of a new civilization, the New Commandment as Christ Himself called it. On the day when it was said to the individual: "Love God above all things and thy neighbor as thyself for the love of God’; to the citizen: ‘Render to God the things that are God’s and to Caesar the things that are Caesar’s’; to the State: ‘Seek first the kingdom of God and its justice’ (1)—on that day there arose a new morality, a new public law, a new social ideal. Like a mysterious leaven, the creative word worked upon and permeated humanity, and all the manifestations of justice and love there produced from century to century are but the result of this marvelous fermentation: ‘The kingdom of heaven is like to leaven, which a woman took and hid in three measures of meal, until the whole was leavened’. (2)

(1) Freeman, "The Methods of Historical Study."

On the day when the Christian religion gave to mankind its compass and pointed out its polar star, there began for humanity a life worth living, a life of which the ancient poet (3) seemed to have had an obscure presentiment when on the frontispiece of the new world he wrote this grand verse:

Magnus ab integro saeculorum nascitur ordo.
The great order of ages is born anew.
Then, walking under the shadow of the cross, the Christian centuries took the road of the future.

Vexilla Regis prodeunt.
Crucis fulget mysterium (4).
The royal banners now unfurled,
The mystic cross illumines the world.
From its birth Christian society has marched on

(1) Matthew VI, 33.
(2) St. Matthew XIII, 33.
(3) The ancient poet here quoted is Virgil. He was born 70 B. C. He is the author of the “Eclogues” (pastoral poems), the “Georgics” (rural poems), and the “Aeneid,” the greatest epic poem in the Latin language. The diffusion of the Messianic prophecies throughout the nations had made the world look for a Savior of mankind and a consequent new and brighter era of history. Virgil gave expression to this universal expectancy in the sublime verse quoted. (Tr. n.)
(4) Opening lines of the Vespers hymn during the Passiontide. (Tr. n.)
its checkered course towards the realization of its sublime ideal. The centuries of the Middle Ages began the work; the modern centuries followed; and our age, heir of both, continues the task and will hand down the work unfinished to future centuries.

\textit{Vicissitudes and future of Christian Civilization.}

The edifice of Christian civilization is not unlike those grand Gothic cathedrals the inspired architects of which could but draw the plans and lay the foundations without seeing their idea realized here below. Generation after generation came to the foot of the edifice and continued the labor of love. They lavished upon it all their talent and wealth; at times they matched the genius of the inspired master; at other times in their enthusiasm they hid the leading architectural lines under a profusion of flowers; then again, by the barrenness or the exuberance of their work, they sometimes put into jeopardy the very principles of Christian art. Thus the venerable monument bears the imprint of all the passing predilections of art. Nay more, in this prolonged work of generations there were times when the hand grew weary, when courage drooped, when the building material slept at the foot of the edifice. This was so true of the Cathedral of Cologne as to give rise to the legend that the structure would never be finished, that the devil would not permit it. . . . Nevertheless, in spite of the devil and his imps, the Cathedral of Cologne has been finished and the twin crosses of its spires glisten in the blue of heaven.

As with the noble Temple of Cologne, so with the edifice of Catholic civilization. Divers hands and opposite talents have worked towards its completion, times of inaction with their train of gloomy tales have befallen it, but to-day new legions of workers swarm about its sides as they spend themselves in the work of raising the sacred spires to loftier and still loftier heights.

APPENDIX

Medieval archeology during the seventeenth century.

The ignorance of men of the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries concerning the history of medieval art is simply appalling. They could not even see the difference between the Romanesque and Gothic styles for both of which they expressed equal contempt. Thus, for instance, in 1686, the celebrated Gilbert Burnett, Anglican archbishop of Salisbury, writes as follows concerning the beautiful Romanesque cathedral of Worms: “There is little remarkable in the cathedral, which is a huge building in the Gothic manner of the worst sort.” The archeological science of the time recognized two kinds of Gothic: “The ancient, originating with the Goths in the fifth century (massive, heavy and coarse buildings), and the modern buildings more delicate, lighter and surprisingly bold.”

Such texts should be put in parallel columns with the celebrated verses of the “Art Poetique” of Boileau on the poetry and the theatre of the Middle Ages; they constitute, so to say, documents of the first rank for “the intellectual history” of the modern epoch and they account in a way for the vandalism which was rampant during the eighteenth century and during the first half of the nineteenth century.